THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1182.—VOL. XLII. SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1863. TWO SHEETS, FIVEPENCE

THE COMING YEAR.

THE changes and chances of modern life almost defy augury. Events rather flash upon than come upon us, and he is a bold man who could sit down calmly to predict the probabilities of a single year. A word, not meant to be unkind and wrongly taken, from one Monarch to the representative of another at a New-Year's reception has brought on a great war, and changed the destinies of a continent and a nation. An election of a Chief Magistrate in a model republic has brought on a civil war and transformed a nation of prosperous traders into almost savage soldiers, and a free Constitution into a despotism as deep and as high as any that the world ever saw. A King, during his absence on a yachting excursion, hears news of his deposition from his throne, and is relegated to that band of ex-Sovereigns who are expiating their faults of misgovernment in genteel exile in various parts of Europe. Monarchs, governmental systems, and all the paraphernalia which goes to make up the outer life of the world, are uncanny things upon which to reckon in an estimate of the hopes and fears of a coming year. At this moment, if one looks abroad one beholds America in the crisis of an internecine struggle too terrible to dwell upon; Mexico suffering from internal divisions, and resisting an invader whose tenacity of purpose in war is proverbial; Japan in a state of revolution; China struggling with an organised and long-standing rebellion; Russia in the agonies of a transition state from serfdom to freedom; Prussia on the eve of a constitutional contest between the King and the people; Austria in her normal condition of national bankruptcy; the new kingdom of Italy agitated, and scarcely well-governed; and Greece in a condition of change, the issue of which for good or for evil is not yet clearly discernible. France, still ostensibly the arbiter of the destinies of Europe, perhaps exhibits no special outward sign of weakness or of coming trouble; but there are not wanting those who assert that the stately Imperial edifice which towers so proudly amongst the palaces of the world is, after all, built upon sand; and its stability is about comparable to that of a house of cards. Financially and socially hollow and baseless, it cannot, say the seers, abide. However this may be, at least it is apparent to very commonplace observers that a system which is founded on the genius and the management of one man alone, a man whose place cannot be supplied, who has realised that which was only a boastful trope in the case of Louis XIV., and has literally unified the State with himself, has about it no elements of stability and endurance; and the present Emperor may well be considered to embody another well-known saying, for, of a surety, after him will be a deluge—of some kind. It may not be too much to assume in speculating on the prospects of the year which has just opened upon us, that most nations have enough upon their hands to occupy if not to distract them during the coming twelve months. To some of them it may be a year of lustration, and in some cases of settlement of much that is disturbing in their body politic; but it is difficult if not impossible to trace any signs of millennial tranquillity, or that the year 1863, as it dawns, gives promise of that state of universal brotherhood which, in the minds of some of our loud-talking, unattached statesmen, is typified by the spectacle of all mankind clothed in peaceful robes, the material of which must inevitably be calico.

But, turning to a very obvious, and to us the most important consideration, what is to be prognosticated in England for the coming year? In what condition is this country to face the eventualities, the responsibilities, and, it may be, the difficulties of another brief cycle of three hundred and sixty-five days. It is true that we have had to encounter—still have to encounter—a commercial and social embarrassment which, brought on by circumstances over which we had no control, has struck hard at a material element in the national prosperity. A darkness which can be felt has descended on an industry which has gradually interwoven itself with our social and financial frame, and a shock to which vibrates painfully through the whole system. If, however, it has entailed much pecuniary suffering and caused considerable social loss, it has proved not a few things which we gladly take to the credit of our national character and our national stability. As regards the former, it has proved that distress and sorrow hard to bear have begotten no fierce discontent, and no deep-mouthed objurgations on the institutions under which we live. Those who are suffering know and feel that they are the victims of a natural and not of a factitious law, that no narrow and class legislation operates now to their detriment, and that affliction has been brought upon them by other means than misgovernment and the partial operation of unjust fiscal regulations. They do not bear the ills that have come upon them as men to whom human sympathy and hope in the future are denied; they recognise, in the universality of the charitable movement in which their countrymen are engaged on their behalf, at once an assistance and a consolation; and they can well believe that the enterprise and the capital of this country are being devoted to the relief of the gap left for the production of that staple raw material the deprivation of which has made them what they are; but what they will never be again, if skill, energy, and forethought can prevent it.

Out of the present calamity of Lancashire it is more than probable that future safety to one of our great manufacturing interests may be made to spring. Despite many difficulties, and in the face of some prejudice, the cultivation of cotton in India to a large extent is becoming a certainty. Happily, there has hardly been in the history of our Indian empire a period of greater tranquillity and greater internal prosperity than now. For whatever can be done in the production of cotton in that country the time is eminently favourable. Obstacles such as want of means of transit will surely give way before the pressure of a great English demand for an article of first manufacturing importance; and, even if some statements which we have heard of the limited capabilities of India to produce cotton be true, there is no denying that a source of supply which is by no means insignificant has been opened. Besides this, an impetus to its cultivation has been given to all cotton-growing countries, from Brazil down to the smallest of our West India islands; and it is not improbable that a trade which has hitherto been a monopoly in the hands of the Southern States of America will ramify all over the world. At least one thing is certain, and that is, that hopes of cotton from America within a period which may be counted by years must have faded from the minds of the most sanguine and the most bigoted believer in that as a sole source of supply. If all that is reported in relation to the expectation of import of cotton from Egypt be true, the manufactories which are now so silent and desolate.

It is at least a favourable start for a new year when the nation is in a position to show a satisfactory balance-sheet at the end of the year which has passed. Considering the difficulties as it appears by the annual statement, is calculated at once to surprise and gratify. There is simple evidence here to establish that though we have had to witness, and in some sense to struggle with, a great commercial and social calamity, it has happily been more local than national. In the main, we have to congratulate ourselves on much that reproaches even to prosperity as indicated by that financial barometer, the revenue returns. There is no lamentation in the haunts of the Exchequer, and no wailing in the purlieus of the Treasury. The national accounts are square, and a great deal more; the Ministerial purse-bearer looks 1863 boldly in the face.

Then we have a prospect that the programme of the Government for the ensuing Session will be based chiefly on a principle of reduction of public expenditure. There are hopes that Mr. Gladstone may be able to announce that his estimates for the year are within that bound of millions which in his last Budget he laid down as the circle of safety. If next year witnesses only the first check in that onward career of expenditure which of late years has made prudent men shudder it ought to be marked by the whitest of stones. Three or four millions less in the estimates would not come amiss; but if, as we hear, there is to be a reduction of ten, why, let the taxpayer sing pæans, and believe that the time of his deliverance is at hand—if he can.

In the political atmosphere no storm seems brewing, and we are not without hope that there will be a disposition on the part of all sections of politicians in Parliament to resist any temptation to waste the time of the Legislature in mere party struggles, it being well understood, in the country at least, that the difference between those statesmen who for convenience call themselves by certain names is about that which exists betwixt tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee, and that there is but one national policy to be carried out, which cannot be influenced by the individuality of Palmerston or Derby. Some social questions must be considered and satisfactorily settled, the national finances regulated and disbursed on the most rigidly economical scale, and peace with all the world preserved; and whoever carries out this simple policy honestly and effectively is welcome to rule over us.

On the whole, with a consciousness of the stability of our institutions, of the soundness of our commercial principles, of the energy, courage, and strength of purpose of our people, and with a sufficient encouragement in a retrospect of the year that has gone, we enter on that which has just been born without fear for the prosperity, the honour, and the greatness of England.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Emperor received the Diplomatic Corps and the constituted bodies of the State on New-Year's Day. The Papal Nuncio congratulated his Majesty in the name of the Diplomatic Body. The Grand Duke Constantine, brother to the Emperor of Russia, has left that peace would be maintained during the year now commenced.

Thursday last, the Moniteur publishes the decree fixing the number of deputies to be elected in future at 283. The Moniteur also announces some nominations to the Legion of Honour.

M. Fould's report on the condition of the French finances, which was published in Sunday's Moniteur, admits that the deficit for the year 1862 will amount to 21,400,000—the expenditure of the Mexican expedition during that year amounting to £3,320,000. The Emperor's relinquishment of his prerogative of opening extraordinary credits has not, says M. Fould, had the effect of increasing the ordinary expenses. The estimates for 1863 show a surplus of £4,400,000, which, in M. Fould's opinion, "will enable us to meet both the Mexican expenses for 1863 and any subsidiary expenses." The aggregate amount of accumulated deficits—£33,920—has not been increased, and no loan will be required, according to M. Fould's calculations. These statements, "were it not for the extraordinary expenses which weigh upon 1862 and 1863, 18 would have been one of the most happy and prosperous years of the reign of 1864. The attainment of this much-to-be-desired result is only adjourned."

Yesterday's Moniteur publishes an Imperial decree ordering that in future the sittings of the Prefectural Councils for the trial of ordinary lawsuits shall be public. After the report upon each cause has been heard the parties will be allowed to make observations, either personally or by their representatives. The decision of the Council, together with its motives, will be pronounced during the sitting, after a consultation, at which neither plaintiff nor defendant will be present. The account of the taxpayers of the departments and of their public charitable establishments will not be audited in public.

Cardinal Morlot, Archbishop of Paris, died on Monday morning at six o'clock. The Emperor paid him a visit on Saturday night. We give a brief memoir of the deceased Prelate in another column. The Abbé Deguerry, Curé of Paris met on Monday, immediately after his death, and elected three Vicars Capitular (MM. Baquet, Surate, and Veron) to administer the diocese until the choice of a successor is appointed.

Fresh reinforcements, numbering apparently 3000 or 4000 men, have been ordered to join General Forey's army in Mexico from France and Algeria.

SPAIN.

In Monday's sitting of the Senate Marshal O'Donnell, in a speech upon Mexican affairs, said that the Treaty of London did not imply any intervention for meddling the Government of Juarez. On the contrary, he said, were to take possession of Vera Cruz and the fort of San Juan d'Ulloa, and to see that satisfaction should be accorded them. Spain had never spoken of intervening in the interior affairs of Mexico. The Plenipotentiaries of the other Powers found the claims of France excessive. Marshal O'Donnell further stated that it was not General Prim who caused the rupture. The re-embarkation of the Spanish troops became indispensable on account of the present state of things. The real cause of the rupture was Almonte, who had deceived France. In conclusion, Marshal O'Donnell commured the conduct of the Government of Juarez with regard to the Spanish prisoners. In reply to the speech produced a great sensation.

The address in the Senate was then adopted by 95 against 23 votes.

Three editors of the Epoca, holding Government appointments, have, in consequence of their differing with the Government upon the Mexican question, tendered their resignations, which has been accepted. One of the Councillors of State has also sent in his resignation. Marshal O'Donnell does not intend to accept any resignation which may be tendered. It is stated that he approves of the acts of General Prim during his stay in Mexico, but not his language towards the Emperor and his brave relative to France. Neither does Marshal O'Donnell favour General Prim's views in regard to the union of the Liberal party.

ITALY.

SPEECH OF VICTOR EMMANUEL.

At the Court levée held at Turin on Thursday the King spoke to the following effect:—"I am satisfied to observe the path you trust to him, and expressed the hope that 1863 would be a happier year than 1862, in the welfare of Italy, the concessions, who endangered public order. When the pacification of the Southern provinces was achieved the national cause would be fully triumphant. The spirit of the people was most excellent, and wholly Italian. With it and a concordant nation the world might be defied.

AUSTRIA.

In Monday's sitting of the committee elected by the shareholders of the Bank of Austria, the question of the directors of the Bank accept the agreement between the State and the bank, which had been voted by the Reichsrath, was passed after a long discussion.

PRUSSIA.

A Royal decree published in Berlin convenes the Prussian Chambers for the 14th inst.

DENMARK.

Prince Gortschakoff is said to have declared to Denmark, on behalf of Russia, in a positive manner, that "the only means of putting an end to the interminable Dano-German conflict would be to accept the propositions recently presented by Earl Russell with regard to Schleswig-Holstein."

SWEDEN.

The Chambers have just adopted a bill presented by the Government to authorise marriages between Christians and Jews. The passing of this measure, which has caused a certain impression in Sweden, is generally considered as a first step towards civil marriages, of which a member of the Upper Chamber has just, by a special motion, demanded the introduction into the Constitution.

GREECE.

There was a great popular manifestation in Athens on Tuesday, the crowd shouting for Prince Alfred as King of Greece. The Hon. Mr. Elliott was obliged to repeat the decision of the British Government to refuse the crown for the Prince, but at the same time he promised the Greeks the sympathy and the good-will of England.

The Fremdenblatt says that the Cabinet of Vienna has called the attention of the English Government to the serious difficulties which the cession of the Ionian Islands is likely to create.

The Greek journals publish a collective note addressed, on the 13th of December, to the Provisional Government by England, France, and Russia, announcing the agreement between the three Powers that no members of the family reigning over the protecting States can accept the crown of Greece, and that, consequently, Prince Alfred and the Duke de Leuchtenberg are alike excluded from the Greek throne.

AMERICA.

By the arrival of the steamers North American and Hansa we are in receipt of New York journals of the 20th ult.

WAR NEWS.

The great battle of Fredericksburg, in which the Federal armies sustained a disastrous repulse, is described in the Supplement, page 18.

On the night of the 15th the army of the Potomac was withdrawn to the north side of the Rappahannock, "because," reports General Burnside, "I felt fully convinced that the position in front could not be carried, and it was a military necessity either to attack the enemy or retire." This gallant movement was effected without a severe night, and was not discovered by the Confederates until it was too late to intercept it. The wounded were all saved, and the pontoon bridges removed.

The Confederates have advanced their pickets in Fredericksburg to points near to the bank of the Rappahannock, have increased their intrenchments in the rear of the city, and thrown up rifle-pits on the left of the city near the river.

Official reports of the Northern losse put their casualties at 1400 killed, and 8000 wounded, to which may be added 900 taken prisoners.

The Confederate official account of Lee has drawn up his report of the engagement. He acknowledges a loss of 1800 in killed and wounded. Among the latter are Generals Cobb and Gregg.

The Federal Senate has ordered inquiry to be made into the facts of the Fredericksburg disaster.

There have been serious movements in North Carolina. The Confederate General Evans had telegraphed that the Federal General attacked Kinston, on the 14th inst., with 10,000 men and nine gun-boats. The fight lasted ten hours, and the Federals were driven back to their gun-boats. The Northern accounts admit that they lost 500 prisoners and eleven pieces of artillery. Kinston and Goldsboro were eventually compelled to retire from the town, the Federal bombardment having proved too heavy.

The Confederates have made a demonstration against Harper's Ferry, but were repulsed.

Five dashing raids are reported of Banks's expedition have put into Port Royal.

The Confederates have sunk the Federal gun-boat Cairo with torpedoes off Yazoo River.

Twenty thousand men have deserted from the army of the Potomac, and the number is every day increasing.

NEW ORLEANS.

General Butler has issued an order that no person be allowed to land from any vessel arriving at New Orleans without taking the oath of allegiance. General Butler had ordered a further assessment of the cotton-brokers for the use of the poor.

WASHINGTON.

The New York journals simultaneously report that Mr. Seward has resigned, in consequence of a vote of want of confidence in the Cabinet caused by a caucus of the Republicans.

Attorney-General Bates has given an opinion in opposition to the Hon. Reverdy Johnson, that the Alabama colonel was a citizen of the United States. The case arose from the detention at Perth Amboy, by a revenue cutter, of a schooner commanded by a coloured man, who, if not a citizen of the United States, would have been incompetent to act as her captain. The Attorney-General decides that all free persons, without distinction of race and colour, of native born, are citizens. The question of citizenship is distinct from that of political rights. A child or a woman is a citizen, though not privileged to vote or take office. The opinion that the Dred Scott case are pronounced to be of no more authority than the obiter dicta of eminent lawyers, as the question before the Supreme Court in that case only involved the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court. The master of the schooner is pronounced to be legally competent to command the vessel, and the embargo laid on her is ordered to be quashed.

THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

President Davis has left Tennessee to visit Mobile and the army of the Mississippi.

The Commander of the French corvette Yusalan lately visited Port Sumter in company with General Beauregard.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The popular feeling runs high in New York against General Halleck and Secretary Stanton, to whom the late reverse of the Federal arms is attributed.

Mr. Barney, the horsetamer, has been appointed Commissioner of Horses in the Federal States. His first official act was to go to the army of the Potomac under Burnside. Horses suffered fright into the health or the horses, and has adopted a new system to check the mortality among them.

The British Consul at Fredericksburg was arrested by the Federals on the 11th, on suspicion of being a rebel spy, but was in a short time released. On the 12th, on the request of the Consul, he was again arrested, on the charge that he had secreted armed rebels in his house and then aided them in their escape.

The commercial failures in the States and the leading bankers are agreed in the condemnation of Mr. Chase's plan for the recreation of the banks of the country. Gold remains nearly stationary at about 32 per cent premium.

INDIA.

The news from Calcutta, coming down to the 22nd ult., of any importance is comprised in the fact that the Government had ordered on sending a force to contend the disturbances in the Jyntesh district, and that Captain Sinclair had been attacked and wounded by two Arabs while at the head of his regiment at Sangrum, a place within sixty miles of Hyderabad.

CHINA.

From China we have accounts of the capture of Fung-Wha and Kahding, two towns in the neighbourhood of Ningpo, held by the rebels. They were stormed with great gallantry by the British and French and handed over to the Imperialists. The rebels keep a respectful distance from Shanghai, but it was reported that they intended to attack Hankow, to which they had approached within twenty-five miles, but retired on the approach of the Imperial troops.

JAPAN.

We now learn the meaning of the "bloodless revolution" in Japan, announced some time since in a telegram. Jeddo, it appears, has hitherto formed a political centre at Japan, where the forty-and-a-half of Royalty has been enacted by the prime officer, the Tycoon; and the great daimios and their families are bound, in order to keep up the dignity of the Tycoon, to reside at Jeddo. The daimios have abrogated this regulation and withdrawn from the city, and have thereby decluded it of all that rendered it great and shorn the Tycoon of a greater portion of his dignity.

AUSTRALIA.

There is but little news from Australia. The Melbourne and Murray River Railway had been opened with great rejoicings. The goldfields were on the whole, yielding well, and trade was steady.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Arrangements are being made to hold a grand review of the volunteers of the midland and south midland counties at Oxford, in July next.

Lord Palmerston has been appointed president of a society for the protection of salmon in the River Tees, in Hampshire.

The Townhall of Chester was destroyed by a fire which broke out in the building on Tuesday night.

Lord Carlisle left Castle Howard on Tuesday en route for Holkar, the seat of the Duke of Devonshire.

It is announced that an amalgamation or union is to be formed between the Eastern Bank of Scotland and the Caledonian Company.

The Earl of Carlisle presided, on Wednesday week, at the distribution of prizes to the pupils of the Royal Hibernian Military School, Dublin.

Sir Archibald Alison has delivered a lecture in Glasgow on "Penal Servitude and Transportation," in which he elaborately condemned the present system and strongly recommended a return to transportation.

Mr. Justice Wright, of the Halifax County Court, has just laid down the following rule in reference to debts for beer—viz., not to give a second order for beer to the wife of a husband who has been cautioned him not to allow beer on credit to her husband.

The Greeks of Manchester have shown themselves as well disposed to their Sovereign as have the majority of their countrymen. Out of ninety-two votes Prince Alfred received ninety in that city; the remaining two were given to King Ferdinand.

At the annual conference of the General Associated Body of Church Schoolmasters in England and Wales, which was opened at Oxford on Tuesday, it was resolved, by a majority of 14, "That it is desirable to apply to Parliament for a Scholastic Registration Act, analogous to the Medical Registration Act of 1858."

Mr. Robert Hunt, High Sheriff of the city of Limerick, visited the county on Tuesday week, and on his arrival presented a copy of the order due of all the pauper debtors, who were then liberated, in order to enjoy the Christmas with their families; and, in addition, the sum of £100 at the request of the Governor of the prison a sum of money to assist the outgoing debtors in enjoying their Christmas.

The drawing for the prizes offered by the Art-Union of Great Britain took place last Saturday, in the Free Trade Hall Assembly-Room. The committee reported that 101,726 tickets had been issued, thus showing an increase of 2693 upon the last one. The number of tickets sold for 1861 was 179,033, for 1862, 204,401. The prizes drawn for consisted of 251 plates, 256 statuary prizes, 352 engravings, 35 volumes, and 207 sets of photographs; making a total of 1300 prizes, or one to every 157 tickets.

Mr. Horsman made an after-dinner speech at Stroud last Saturday evening, in which he passed in review the leading questions of the day. With regard to the American war he expressed his entire approval of the policy of strict non-interfer ence hitherto pursued by her Majesty's Government, and he added that he was not anxious to precipitate the sovereign of the South, or European interference of any kind in the struggle between the Federal and Confederate States.

Thomas Lucas died at Wunstead on the 29th ult., at the united age of 100 years and 100 days. He had a remarkably healthy appearance for one of his years, was of courteous manners, and of a very cheerful temper, and retained excellent health and the complete use of all his faculties (including his memory) to the last, and especially to the end. About the last few days or months of his death he chopped his own firewood, and was conversational and agreeable to the last hour, and was gentle and kind to the last moment.

At a dinner on Christmas Day, in Marsden, near Burnley, to which an invitation had been issued to a poor man living in the township who had attained the age of 65 years, there was present John Pale, a venerable old man, 79 years of 8 months old, who had walked upwards of two miles to be present, and after dinner he walked home again. He has a wife 94 years old, who is present to-day from home. The two remarried about 50 years, and married 26 years last Good Friday. Of the company present on the occasion, the three oldest averaged 73 years of age, the twenty oldest averaged 83, and 177 averaged 76 years each.

Accounts from Worsborough, on Saturday, state that the bodies of the six unfortunate boys who were the victims of an accident at the Elsecar Main Colliery continue immersed in their gloomy sepulchre, and that there are but little hopes that they will be recovered for many days. Every description is being raised for the sufferers.—An extensive four-shaft colliery, at Stanley, near Wakefield, is on fire, the result of a fall of roof in the upcast shaft having become ignited by the heat of the furnace. All the shafts for a few yards from the bottom have been filled up, so as to prevent as much as possible all the atmospheric air. No lives were lost.—A terrible accident occurred at the gas-works, near Stockport, on Saturday morning, in Shropshire. As twelve persons—men and boys—got into a "cage" for the purpose of being lowered into the mine, in order to commence operations for the day by which the chain was fixed to the cage snapped, and they were precipitated a few hundred yards, a depth of 960 feet. The whole twelve were killed.—Last Saturday, the stokers who so heroically exerted themselves on behalf of the men imprisoned in the Hartley Main mine were presented with the medals which had been prepared for their reception.—An explosion of gas, happily unattended by loss of life, occurred in Bedminster Coal-pit on Monday.

The Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone presided, on Tuesday evening, over a weekly musical and literary entertainment, in the Music Hall, Chester. In a speech which Mr. Gladstone made in the course of the evening's performances, he entered largely into the statistics of the cotton famine, and said there was one point in regard to the high-water mark of the distress may have been reached, and even passed. "It seems to be the opinion of the best-informed people," he remarked, "that, under the operation of the Provisional laws which regulate supply and demand, both for materials and for manufactured goods, the high-water mark is the point which is a state of things which will bring about a small but stable revival of trade and employment." But, in my case, he trusted he might express a confident hope that the county would be in a position to meet the spring with sufficient funds to mitigate the worst of the distress that has overtaken Lancashire. The spirit, both gentleman spoke in the warmest terms of the conduct of the operatives under their terrible ordeal of suffering, and pointed out that the present time came for considering the question of the franchise their patient and exemplary conduct during the present crisis would not be forgotten. Mr. Gladstone estimated that on the current financial year the loss on the revenue in consequence of the cotton famine would amount to more than a million.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL.

The Belgian Moniteur announces that passports for Italian travellers in Belgium, and for Belgian travellers in Italy, are abolished. Travellers will only be required to produce some document establishing their identity.

The text of the treaty recently concluded between France and Madagascar has just been published in the French journals. It is a treaty of commerce, and the most noteworthy point in connection with it is that Radama II. is recognised by the Emperor Napoleon as the independent Sovereign of that island.

A correspondent of the Guardian says the following are the several outposts or military colonies which England has at different times possessed in the Mediterranean:—Minorca, which England first acquired in 1047 from Aragon by conquest, ceded to France in 1757; Bonifacio, on the Mediterranean, in 1667 from Genoa by conquest, ceded to France in 1768; Dunkirk, acquired in 1658 from Spain by conquest, ceded to France in 1662; Tangier, acquired in 1662 from Portugal by marriage, ceded to Morocco in 1683; Minorca, acquired in 1704 from Spain by conquest, ceded to Spain in 1782; Gibraltar, in 1704 from Spain by conquest, ceded to Spain; Malta, acquired in 1798 from France by conquest; Corfu, acquired in 1809 from France by conquest, ceded to Greece in 1864; Ionian Islands, by our occupation, was England tenancy; it next two bargeses to the House of Commons that the Ionian Islands were to be the bonds of Christendom: it was for some time the seat of the staple for English wool. Malta has been for many years vacated by us from France, had only recently been acquired by the French, the former from the Knights of St. John, and the latter from Venice.

FRENCH SAVINGS-BANKS.—On the first day of the present year we published a summary of the proceedings of the Paris savings-banks during the year 1861. We have now before us a report by M. Reveil on the operations of the savings-banks throughout the whole of France in the year just ended. The number of depositors, 1,606,981; and the sum due to them, 1,000,000 francs, making, together 354,720,414f. From that sum must be deducted sundry refunds, amounting to 15,552,687f., and the balance (338,167,727f.) represents the total sum due to depositors amounted to 401,313,317f., being an increase on the total due at the corresponding period of 1860 of 24,145,590f., or about 6.37 per cent. It the total amount due by the savings-banks to their clients on Dec. 31, 1861, be divided by the number of the depositors, the average would be 208f. for each account. On Dec. 31, 1860, the average was 209f. The above savings were executed in sixty-two departments, and not attained in twenty-seven. On Jan. 1, 1861, the 449 savings-banks held 12,153 inscriptions of rente belonging to 12,665 depositors, and producing 314,626f. During the year there were purchased, at the request of 14,17 depositors, 13,678 inscriptions, producing 477,369f. of rente. On the other hand, the banks delivered up to 14,199 depositors, producing 496,386f. of rente. On the last of December, 1861, they had in hand 12,599 inscriptions, belonging to 13,485 depositors, producing 379,887f. of rente.—Galignani.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The British Museum is closed, and will remain so until Wednesday next, the 7th inst.

The medals awarded to the exhibitors at the International Exhibition are in course of delivery, and notices have been sent requesting those entitled to receive them to send for them before the 10th inst.

Several of the metropolitan volunteer rifle corps had marches out on "field-days" on Boxing Day, which were, generally speaking, attended with success.

That portion of the traffic on the London, Chatham, and Dover line, which was lately opened between the Victoria Station, Pimlico, and the Brighton line, at Battersea-bridge, is for the present worked by the subsidence of several arches of a viaduct near the Clapham Station.

The Thames Embankment Commission, recently reappointed by the Crown, have received its inquiries in relation to various matters connected with the proposed new street communications, and to questions relating to compensation for property.

The half-yearly meeting of the friends and supporters of the Royal Dispensary for Diseases of the Ear was held at the Dispensary, Dean-street, Soho-square. From the report read by the secretary it appeared that the dispensary was still flourishing and doing good by giving them advice and medicine. During the last six months 1086 patients had been admitted, of whom 1000 had been relieved, and 86 had left without applying. It was greatly, but the means of relieving them were limited by the want of funds.

A fire, resulting in the death of six children, occurred at Portland-street, Soho, on Saturday night. Several persons in most gallant style entered the burning premises and saved some of the inmates. The metropolis originated in the house, and the flames spread with great rapidity. A man has been fined by the magistrates for interfering with the police and pulling down the shutters, thus giving draught to the fire and aiding the fearful loss of life.

The usual Christmas course of lectures at the Royal Institution have commenced. On Tuesday afternoon Dr. Tyndall had been the custom of Professor Faraday to deliver these lectures to a juvenile audience, but as the latter gentleman is unfortunately laid up with a severe cold, we understand that it continues to prevent him this Christmas. His accustomed place was occupied on Tuesday by Dr. Tyndall, who delivered a lecture on the subject of the annual course of six lectures "Air and Water." We give in another column an abstract of Dr. Frankland's lecture.

At last accounts is a prospect of the Underground Railway being opened for the use of the public. Another official inspection of the line was made on Wednesday week by Colonel Yolland, when everything appeared to express himself satisfied on the whole with what had been done by way of improving the line since the previous inspection. It is said that it might be rendered still more efficient. On Tuesday Colonel Yolland made another trip along the line, and it is said that he has expressed himself as entirely in opposition on the part of the Board of Trade to the opening of the line, which, however, positively takes place on Jan. 10.

Last week the births of 1610 children—829 boys and 781 girls—were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1852-61 the average number was 1,463. Of the 1610 children born, 1,000 died. The deaths of London exhibit a further decrease on the high mortality of November. The number of deaths was 1,000, which is the lowest number registered in the ten years, 1852-61, with a correction for increase of population, is 1,560. Both phthisis and bronchitis have declined from the high rate of the previous weeks. Six persons, aged ninety years and upwards, died in the week. A widow died in the week in Bethnal-green workhouse who was born in Ireland, and at the age of one hundred years, and to have been born a fortnight before George IV. A woman also died in the week in Bethnal-green who had died from a wound of erysipelas, from a punctured wound of the thumb. A woman was suffocated by swallowing a bone. Two persons died from burns in the first week in December.

On Tuesday, by order of the First Commissioner of Works and Public Buildings, Messrs. Pullen, Horne, and Rivetshil sold by auction, at the Great Exhibition Building, the whole of the fittings, including the whole of the trappings, funeral equipments, and furniture used on the occasion of the lying in state of the late Prince Consort, from the 14th to the 18th days of November, 1862. These national and interesting objects consisted of the richly-carved oak pulpit, communion-table, and rails of the Royal Chapel of the Hospital, which were of the most costly and elaborate description. There were also the canopy of the late Prince Consort, richly-carved and richly embroidered or velvet in gold and coloured silk; a large crown, richly embroidered in gold and coloured silks, and velvet; and 1000 yards of white and many other costly ornaments. The funeral trappings consisted of 240 velvet housings, richly embroidered in gold, silver, and silk; 240 velvet plumes made for the eight horses that drew the massive funeral car. The novelty of the sale attracted a large number of persons to the spot, and the prices for some of the lots there was a brisk competition, on the whole low prices only were realised.

The precise sites of the proposed new metropolitan bridges across the Thames are defined by the plans and sections just deposited with Lord Hobart, the Chairman of Quarter Sessions for the county of Middlesex—namely, the Tower Bridge, St. Paul's Bridge, the Temple Bridge, New Chelsea Bridge, and Battersea Bridge. Each bridge will be for the use of foot passengers only, and the other for both carriages and horses. The Tower Bridge is proposed to be built from a point in the Tower Pool opposite the Horselydown Old-stairs. The St. Paul's Bridge scheme comprises a bridge and approaches from the Surrey side commencing at Bankside, on the Thames at a point 100 yards north of the junction of Love-lane with Bankside on the Surrey side, and terminating at the junction of Carter-lane with Doctor Fenning, and terminating at Bankside, at a point nearly opposite Love-lane, and terminating on the Middlesex side at a point opposite Carter-lane. The Temple Bridge starts from the Thames embankment, 100 yards in a westerly direction from the Temple Station, and crosses the river obliquely, terminating 90 yards in a north-easterly direction from the river entrance. The New Chelsea Bridge will start from a point in the embankment on the Surrey side, with approaches from Duke-street and Old Barge House-stairs, Church-street, Lambeth, and terminate in the embankment on Middlesex side, opposite Oakley-street, Chelsea, and end at the Albert-road, Battersea Park, on the Surrey side. The Battersea Bridge will commence in the embankment, in the York-road, Wandsworth, 200ft. to the east of the Jews'-road, will terminate in the Battersea Park, on the Middlesex side, at a point 200ft. to the east of Queen Elizabeth Tower. The time specified for the completion of the bridges is within two years from the date of the Act of Parliament.

A meeting of the Royal National Life-boat Institution was held, on Thursday, at its house, John-street, Adelphi—Thomas Chapman, Esq., F.R.S., V.P., in the chair—when the secretary read the reports of the crews of the institution's life-boat station at Rye, Cardigan, Portheawl, Barry, Penarth, Aberdovey, Lytham, Southport, and Formby, on the local gales of wind, the following shipwrecked crews:—Ship James Browne, of Sunderland, 1000 tons burden, coal laden, from Sunderland for Rochester Champion, of Liverpool, 10; barque Result, of Liverpool, 13; steamer Royal Rose, of Whitby, 12; barque Ann, of Whitby, 11. It was reported that the cost of the life-boats stationed at Thurso and Portheawl were presented respectively by Captain Andrew A. H. Trail, R.N., and by Mr. Goodchild, of Staffordshire. Rewards, amounting to £40, were also granted to the crews of the following vessels which had been assisted:—The schooner Providence Bay, Holyhead, and Greenport, life-boats, for putting off with the view of saving life from the schooner Ann, of Whitby, which was observed in a severe either succeeded in getting out of danger or had their crews saved by other vessels; the brig Ann, of Whitby, which was driven on the rocks at Swarlock, master of the steam-tug Wyrne, of Fleetwood, and Mr. Robert Greenwood, of Lytham, for their services in towing the barque Pallas, of Glasson Dock, which had stranded on the bar of the river Ribble, into Lytham, and Edwin, of Whitstable, which, during a heavy gale of wind and in a dense fog, fell in with the barque Ann, of Whitby, and towed her into safety. The report was read from the assistant inspector of life-boats (Captain Davis) relative to the life-boat establishment at the mouth of the Mersey and the Irish coast. With one or two exceptions he found the boats in excellent condition. The Rev. Mr. Hutchinson, of Formby, had given a donation as a token of her sympathy. The institution decided to place forthwith a new life-boat at Rye, in addition to the one at present stationed at the life-boat station. Payments amounting to £560 having been made on various life-boat establishments, the meeting terminated.

THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.—On Wednesday the Royal Commissioners formally gave up possession of the building to Messrs. Kirk and Lucas. The ceremony took place in the presence of a few persons only, assembled in the Sanctum standing a bench of keys to Mr. Lucas. With this formality the exhibition of 1862 may be said to have come to an end, which has been more or less before the public for the last two years, passed with the exception of the Commissioners, and a few officials. Spain have not yet ceased their cost; Austria has a few packages to remove, and a great deal of packing remains to be done by Russia; so a few days' Russia has left several large packages of heavy goods until the last minute, and has been given to Messrs. Minton, with respect to their magnificent fountain, which still stands intact beneath the eastern dome, looking strangely out of place in the deserted pile. The grim-looking bronze of Bunsingodin, of Messrs. Elkington, are the only objects which keep it company in this part of the building. In the new there stands a melancholy wreck—the mixed-pickle trophy—no one seeming to care so much for it as to be at the expense of removing it. Why some manager had not secured it for a feature in his pantomime! The ornamental casting of granite is still in its place in the nave. A few days' work is required to complete on the avenue, and purchased it for £100, and preparations are being made for its immediate removal. The old Natural History building, Kensington, although it has not been taken down; and there are some few odds and ends remaining in different parts of the main exhibition building, the erection of trophies which a short time since occupied the space. The large clock of Messrs. Dent, of the Strand, which formed so striking an object in the eastern window, will, with the consent of Messrs. Kelk and Lucas, remain until something definite has been decided with respect to the fate of the building. It still keeps that some remarkable accurate time which, during the busy days of the exhibition, caused it to be regarded as one of the marvels of modern mechanism. Its hands, of twenty-two feet long, still point with unerring fidelity to the hours, being connected with the Greenwich Observatory, and rivaling the performance of the Great Victoria clock at Westminster, and which is the admiration and humility which are so fully developed beneath the domes. The picture-galleries have long since been stripped of their contents. The only thing to keep to turn that is simple instance has occurred at any injury having been received either in the carriage of the pictures or during the time they remained on view.—Morning Post.

After a long and irritating delay, an official notice appeared in Tuesday's Gazette announcing that the distribution of the Canadian prize money would commence at Chelsea Hospital yesterday (Friday).

The colonelcy of the 26th Foot is vacant by the death of General Sir Philip Bainbrigge. He obtained had seen much active service in different parts of the globe, and had a medal and seven clasps for the Peninsula. He was in the 52nd Light Infantry at the battle of Waterloo.

Admiral Newall died on the 24th ult., at Kensington, aged 79 years. He was in the attack upon the citadel of Algiers, in the frigate Amazone and Blake, in November, 1816; in a partial action with the French fleet off Toulon, in 1823; and in the successful attack upon Leghorn, and at the relation of Genoa and Savona.

Major-General A. Tulloh, Director-General of Ordnance, has recently inspected the Royal Gun Factories at Woolwich and other manufacturing departments of the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich; and by a recent order of the Secretary of State for War, Major-General Tulloh is particularly to the Secretary for War upon all questions relating to the efficient maintenance of stores, fortifications, barracks, and defences, small arms, and ammunition, and the changes required in existing armaments.

Captain F. Vicars, of the 68th Foot (a cousin of Captain Hedley Vicars), has had a singular escape. A bullet has just removed a scratch on the chin whilst hunting, which soon healed, shortly after which he died of erysipelas in the head, which commenced from a splinter of bamboo, about half an inch long, fixed in the angle of the jaw. The funeral of the deceased, who appears to have resembled his relative in popular manners, was largely attended by civilians as well as comrades.

A committee has been appointed to test the merits of the breechloading rifle invented by Colonel Jacob, of the Indian army. Viscount Ramsay, Inspector-General of Infantry, president; Colonel Taylor, R.A., Superintendent of the Royal Gun Factories; Major Boxer, Director of Artillery Studies; Colonel Simmons, C.B., R.E., Captain Freely, C.B., R.N., and Commander Dawkins, R.N., Superintendent of Pembroke Yard. It is to be observed (says the Army and Navy Gazette) that the members have not been selected as civilian inquiries, and are free from official bias as regards the merits of either invention.

THE VOLUNTEER FORCE.—The main recommendation of the Royal Commission on the Volunteer Force, which has been the means of giving strength and permanence to the volunteer force was, that a grant should be made to the force in proportion to the number of effective strength. It was believed that without some such aid many persons, whose services are highly valuable, would withdraw themselves, and would be obliged to fall off from the body, and that with it there were every reason to expect that the volunteer army would continue as numerically strong as it was at the time to report was made. In fact, it may be assumed that the Government will substantially do their part in the matter, and that it will be for the Parliament to give full effect to the recommendation of the Volunteer Commission. The sum requisite for this purpose will not be considerable, and it is to be hoped that the national outlay passes without close scrutiny. A careful estimate must be formed of the sum likely to be required, as well as the return of men on which to be expected from it. In this spirit some new regulations are being framed, we believe, very much on the principle suggested by the Royal Volunteer officers constituting the Royal Commission, and one of the first recommendations of the Commissioners, which is, that the expenditure of the State for the volunteers might be estimated for the next financial year. The Secretary of State for War has issued a notification that, after the beginning of 1863, he would not be prepared to receive applications for the formation of fresh rifle corps. In taking this step the Secretary of State for War is not for a moment to be understood as discouraging the patriotic volunteering movement in which arbitrary limits. He will not reject more volunteer recruits, but he does not wish to add to the number of corps for the present year. The staff is provided by the War Office sufficient for an establishment of 210,000 men, but the total force is now 162,000. Lord Elcho and Colonel Dawkins have said that the act of forbidding the formation of new corps has any effect in checking the movement. Where there is a number of men in a corps, 100 have to be reached, and there is no prospect that such a number of vacancies in the existing regiments will occur. The Secretary of State for War has, indeed, all, unless circumstances occur likely to alter the whole military arrangements of the nation. We believe that the volunteer force numbers for 1863-4 come to be placed before the public, they will command themselves to all as a wise and judicious compromise encouragement to a movement which is the pride of our generation.—Globe.

GARIBALDI AT CAPRERA.—We read in the Movimento of Genoa:—"Dr. Basile, physician to General Garibaldi, has left Caprera. The General's latter was lowered on to a boat and thence removed on the shore. On the General, who had recently been ill, his departure was received with pleasure. The two medical attendants and M. Occhiphiti carried the litter in their arms to the door of the house, where it was placed on the ground floor of the old house. The Garibaldi, after four months' trouble, again saw the sun on Sunday, the 14th inst., at eight o'clock in the morning of Dec. 22 that the General re-entered his habitation. Towards ten o'clock, after the latter had undergone the dressing, he expressed a wish that his litter might be transported outside and taken about the cultivated land of the farm. The General, who congratulated himself on returning to revisit his fields, the vine, and the olives, to which Practically hypercharacterised his convalescence. The day was a mild autumnal temperature. The sea of Caprera have already imprinted the physical and mental condition of Garibaldi, who congratulated himself on the change of air from the sick chamber, where at least he can breathe the air freely. There was a little snow on the day he arrived, but since then it was of mild autumnal temperature. The wind is below, and the sea scarcely at all swollen. The mountains of Caprera are now not full. Christmas Day was celebrated near his bed. The rose and lee of Garibaldi's room were decorated with flowers."

Painful accounts of the disasters caused by the late gale continue to be received. On Friday, pursuant to an order from November to London, has gone over, with all hands, the bad twenty-one and one and thirty-two passengers on board, and the only trace of her loss has been the discovery of some boxes floating in the Channel. The Tyne pilot-cutter, which is a new and very large iron vessel, left the Tyne just before the gale, and has not since been heard of. The Aberdeen, the Dundee, and the Leith steamers, the Tay and the Conqueror, the Dundee, has experienced the same fate on the Kyle of Lochalsh, and the Leith steamer has been driven ashore somewhere near the north-west coast of Scotland. The gale proved fearfully destructive along the coast of Ireland. On the Bay of Dublin, the Kingstown steamer belonging to Noss was lost. Forty men, or about one third of the entire mail male population of the town, were drowned. Many lives also have been lost in numerous collisions, have, like Noss, suffered to a most serious extent. At all the fishing-stations on the north-east coast of Ireland Firth, from Kinsale to Donaghadee, many of less damage has been done to fishing-boats, of which no fewer than twenty-six have been totally destroyed. Injury has also been done to a number of small harbours along the coast. The Earl of Caithness nobly exerted himself in assisting the fishermen to save their property. At John o'Groat's the storm occasioned great loss of property. At Mey the sea completely swept away all the small fishing-boats except one, and a Gills only two remain. At Melvich the tide rose so high that it swept away eight coddling boats, with all the fishing materials; 190 lobster-creels were also carried away. The north-east coast of Scotland also suffered greatly. A letter from Wick states that in that neighbourhood seven vessels have been totally, and the partially, wrecked; one entire crew, supposed to consist of twelve hands, drowned; and twenty-seven fishing-boats lost.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1863.

IT is be permitted to borrow an illustration from one of the domestic sports of the season, it may be said that Greece is just now in the position of a child on Twelfth-Night party who has drawn the character of King. The lady president of the games does not think it fit that the juvenile adventurer should retain this character, and gently takes it away; but, in order to console the bereaved child, promises it something much better from the Christmas tree. The child, however, is clamorous, and will not be keeping what it has proclaimed as its own. Greece is resolute upon the point of having an English Prince for her Sovereign, and Britannia, while refusing assent to this arrangement, tries to please Greece by a proffer of the long-coveted Ionian Islands. But Greece does not seem by any means to be appeased by the proposition. She goes on electing Prince Alfred in the most persevering manner, long after the most formal and diplomatic declaration on the part of England that "he is not to be King."

We have discussed the question of the candidature sufficiently to make it unnecessary for us to say more than that the longer that question is studied the more it evidents it becomes that the decision of our Government would have been a wise one even had there been no treaty difficulties in the way. It is certain that, sooner or later, the policy of the ruler of Greece, be he King or President, will become one of aggression as against the Porte, and that very speedily. Governments who shall set himself in opposition to the wish of his people—we do not say that it is an unwise wish—will steal the best possible chance of following King Otho. Now, whatever may be in store for Turkey—and far be it from us to contend that a Mohammedan Power should be for ever maintained in one of the noblest portions of Europe—it is not by an English hand that Turkey must be weakened. We did not lavish all that fearful amount of life and of treasure in the Crimean War, nor put forth such efforts as astonished the world when we repelled an advance upon Turkish territory, to stultify ourselves by approximation to a reverse policy. On the contrary, should Greece attempt any forcible extension of her frontier—a proceeding which, we repeat, would not, in a Greek point of view, be unjust—it would be for England to protest against such a course, and, if needful, to check it by action. It is clear, therefore, that, even were England free to place her Prince upon the throne of Otho, she would be most ill-advised to do so. The happy and more recognised construction of the settlement-treaty makes it unnecessary to raise such a question. It is, we think, to be regretted that the leading Greeks will not frankly accept our answer and endeavour to work round the minds of the people to a more practical issue.

Brief, indeed, has been the consideration given to the candidature of King Ferdinand of Portugal. The word is, in fact, misapplied, for that sensible Prince never intended to stand. His name, however, appears to have excited the utmost anger in the minds of the Greeks: his very name, had a specially objectionable sound to their ears, and his personal qualifications have certainly not been taken into account. The affair was scarcely an incident, assuredly not an episode, in the story of the Greek Revolution; and it needs no further remark than that, if all be true that is said, the Greeks might do much worse than accept Dom Fernando if he would permit it.

Now that a Minister of the Crown has stated to his constituents that England is prepared to surrender the Protectorate of the Seven Islands upon certain conditions, which can by no means be called too stringent, the cession may be assumed to have been discussed by the Powers who are parties to the original compact. Without raising captious objections to a course which it will doubtless be abundantly easy to justify, so far as diplomatic periphrase can do it, we may observe that the conduct of neither the Russian nor the French Foreign Office in reference to the Alfred candidature appears to us to have been marked by that extreme good-will for which credit is claimed by both. It is perfectly clear that the popularity of the English in Greece has taken both the Powers by surprise, and we do not precisely see that such surprise is entirely pleasant. There is no doubt that England as a Power, and Englishmen individually, have done as little as possible to make themselves acceptable to the Greeks. Greece has been the young fellow with three guardians. France has been the jovial, pleasant guardian, who has done his best to amuse his ward; Russia has been the artful guardian, who has supplied him with secret pocket-money; while England has been the grumpy one, who has insisted on his keeping accounts and paying his tradesmen, and, moreover, has not been particularly delicate in discharging this duty, as was specially observable in the incidents that brought on Lord Palmerston's five-hour speech in June, 1850. And as for the resident or travelling English, no Greek will tell you, with any severe acerbity, that we make ourselves more markedly detestable to the Hellenic race than to almost any other, having laid hold of a sort of idea that they are mainly deficient in the characteristic most dear to Mr. Bull, that of straightforward honesty. Yet, in spite of our collective harshness and individual peculiarities, the Greeks had the sagacity to discover that our bark is a good deal worse than our bite, and that a rough friend is better than a smooth enemy. France and Russia have shown a certain amount of pique at this discovery. Russia, by a somewhat questionable, not to say ungracious, timing of her own disclaimer of any idea of supplying a Sovereign, came down by implication and unamplified protestations of her own unsurpassed disinterestedness and philanthropy. We note this because we think that few things would please either of the great Powers more than the getting England into a false position as regards the Septinsular Republic. Russia has, of course, a long-standing grudge against us, and, though we be best friends with France, it would not be disagreeable to the Tuileries to have a little bit of harmless revenge for the Mexican affair. Therefore, it behoves Earl Russell to be very sure what he is about, and to take care that he is not once more made the laughing-stock of the foreign diplomatists, the Greeks have had the sense to discover that our bark is a good deal worse than our bite, and that a rough friend is better than a smooth enemy. France and Russia have shown a certain amount of pique at this discovery. THE COURT.

THE unfavourable weather of the past week has occasionally prevented the Queen from enjoying her accustomed outdoor exercise at Windsor. Her Majesty has taken advantage of the change, and enjoyed drives with Princess Louis of Hesse, generally accompanied by the Prince of Wales and Prince Louis of Hesse.

On Sunday the Queen, the Prince of Wales, Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, and Princess Helena received the sacrament of the holy communion at Whippingham Church, which was administered by the Rev. G. Frobery. Their Royal Highnesses Princess Louise, Prince Arthur, and Prince Leopold attended the service.

On Monday the Duke of Cambridge arrived at the Castle on a visit to the Queen.

On Tuesday the Prince of Wales and Prince Louis of Hesse drove over to Farnhurst and visited the barracks and juvenile prison.

On Wednesday the Prince of Wales and Prince Louis of Hesse, attended by Lieutenant-Colonel Keppel, left the Castle at half-past eleven, from her Majesty's yacht Fairy, Master-Commander Welch, on their way to Winchester, for the purpose of visiting the cathedral, &c. Their Royal Highnesses returned to Osborne at half-past four o'clock.

On Thursday the Queen drove out with Princess Louis of Hesse.

On Christmas Eve, by her Majesty's command, the children belonging to the Whippingham Boys' and Girls' Schools attended at Osborne, where Christmas trees were prepared for them, and each child received a present of clothing. The Queen and Royal family were present on the occasion, and personally distributed the gifts to many of the children.

The Countess of Gainsborough has arrived as Lady in Waiting.

Mr. Kraus, architect, of Mayence, had the honour of submitting to their Royal Highnesses Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse plans and designs which are about to be erected at Darmstadt.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

Her Majesty having commanded that the nuptials of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and Princess Alexandra of Denmark shall be celebrated with great magnificence, preparations have been commenced this week by the employés of the Lord Chamberlain's department at Windsor Castle with that view. A number of extra hands have been engaged, and the work, both in the State apartments and other parts of the castle, is making rapid progress under the superintendence of Mr. W. Seabrook, her Majesty's inspector, assisted by Messrs. Niles, Bentley, &c. The State apartments are being furnished with the superb hangings which were used during the visit of the Emperor and the Empress of the French in 1855, and the Zuccarelli Room is undergoing a complete change. The whole of the furniture, pictures, mouldings, and panel frames are being richly regilt, while the walls are being hung with costly Italian silk, in width, bearing the initials "V.R." encircled with a wreath and ornamented by a crown, the silk being similar to that used in the hangings of the King's Council Chamber, better known as the Queen's Drawing-room. This room contains several unusually large pictures by Zuccarelli, three of them being Scripture pieces, one representing "Jacob Watering his Flock," while the other two, which are very large, and occupy the whole of the west wall, represent "Isaac's Meeting" and "The Finding of Moses." It is expected that this will be used as a drawing-room by the King of Hanover, while other portions of the State apartments will be temporarily fitted up for the use of the Crown Prince and Princess of Prussia. In other parts of the castle suites of apartments are being fitted up with much care and taste, especially those which will be occupied by their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Prince Christian of Denmark, and other members of the same Royal family, who will be present at the celebration of the Royal wedding.

The Duke of Sutherland has left Paris, on his way to Marseilles, where his Grace will meet the Duchess and proceed direct to Naples to meet the Duchess, who has been residing there for some weeks.

The Earl of Clarendon has returned to the Grove, near Watford, from Grosvenor-place.

The Earl Delawarr, who has been suffering from indisposition for some days past, is now much better.

The Earl of Fife has left Grosvenor-place on a visit to Viscount Powerscourt, at his seat in Ireland. Her Ladyship has left town for Cumberlege Wells.

The remains of the late Earl of Gifford were interred on Monday last in the churchyard at Hendon. The ceremony was strictly private.

The marriage of Viscount Royston with Lady Georgiana Wellesley will take place, early in the ensuing month, at Paris.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

The "election" of Dr. Thomson to the Archbishopric of York took place on Monday at York Minster.

The parish church of Dartford was reopened on the 23rd ult., after having been closed during the restoration of the chancel.

The reopening of the parish church and consecration of the burial-ground at Market Lavington took place on the 11th inst.

A new Protestant church has been recently reopened at Havre. The ceremony was by the consecration of the church and the congregation, which was composed of various sects of Christians. All the authorities of the town and of the garrison were present. A sermon was preached by each of the two pastors of the community, of which the subject was Liberty of Conscience. The ceremony was the first that has taken place of the reunion of the town, which produced 1800f.

On Wednesday evening, being New Year's Eve, the parish and district churches throughout the metropolis were numerously attended, to offer up thanksgivings for the mercies vouchsafed during the past year by the Almighty and to pray for a continuance of the same in the present year. The services were of the most solemn description, and appropriate sermons were preached by the respective incumbents shortly before midnight. In several of the London churches on Thursday morning there was a service, with sermon, to inaugurate the new year.

The following clergymen have recently been presented with testimonials:—The Rev. T. Lee, from the inhabitants of Tewkesbury; the Rev. Hilary, on his leaving the district. The Rev. T. H. TOWN AND HARBOUR OF SYRA, IN THE GRECIAN ARCHIPELAGO.

SYRA, IN THE GREEK ARCHIPELAGO.

SYRA is one of the group of islands called the Cyclades, which form part of the modern kingdom of Greece. It is situated on the base of a triangular group—Thermia being to the west of it, Delos and Myconos to the east, while Zea, Andros, and Tinos are on the north. Like all the islands of the Ægean Sea, it rises from the water in bold precipitous mountains, bare of vegetation and inhospitable in appearance. It is about ten miles in length by five in breadth, and consists entirely of mountains, chiefly composed of mica-slate and lime-stone, with shallow valleys between them. In these valleys the vine grows luxuriantly, and fertile tracts may be found which the external appearance of the island offers no promise of. Homer praises this island as "Fertile in flocks, in herds, in wine, in corn;" but it is to none of these commodities that Syra owes its present importance and prosperity, which are due entirely to the fact of its having become the great emporium of the Levant, and the great central entrepôt of the Archipelago.

The Island of Syra was a place of no importance until the breaking out of the War of the Revolution. Then the immigration of refugees from different parts of Greece, especially from the islands of Chios and Psara, rapidly raised it to its present flourishing condition. The traffic is now chiefly in the hands of Chiaza, Psyriana, and Myconiana. The port of Syra is situated on the east side of the island, in a bay protected by a small island called Grado-nisi, upon which the harbour light is exhibited. The harbour is very small and deficient in accommodation for large vessels. An attempt has been made to construct a breakwater; a short length only is at present finished, and the works go on very slowly; while the harbour is crowded with shipping of every kind, from the small trading and fishing caique to the largest class of steamers. Many of these may be seen there at the same time, bearing the flags of England, France, and Russia, along with innumerable sailing-vessels of all sizes, and belonging to all nations of the world. In fact, Syra has become to Greece what Malines is to Belgium, and the customs collected here form no small part of the Greek revenues. It has become the entrepôt for the produce not only of the Greek and Turkish islands situated in the Levant, but also for the ports of Asia Minor and the western shores of the Ægean Sea, produce of all kinds being collected here for reshipment. Steam communication is maintained from Syra to Smyrna on the east, and the Pyreus in the west; while all the great lines of steamers, such as the Austrian Lloyds', the Messageries Impériales, and the several lines of steamers from Liverpool and London, touch here on their way to and from Constantinople, Smyrna, Alexandria, and other important places in the Levant, the Archipelago, and the Black Sea.

Our Illustration is taken from a drawing recently made from nature especially for this Journal, and is a View of the Port and Town of Syra, as seen from the harbour; the modern town is called Hermopolis, and is built on the shore surrounding the harbour. The town of old Syra was built on the summit of a conical hill situated between two high mountains; the buildings have increased until the old and new towns have become one, and the town of Syra now covers the whole front and side of the conical hill from the seashore to its summit. The houses are all white, and the effect from the sea is singular and beautiful; but, like all Eastern cities which are beautiful only when seen from a distance, Syra is a poor, dirty place when you get into it. A small, narrow quay runs along the shore, and from it miserable little streets branch off towards the hill; there are no good shops, and not a decent hotel; it is, however, very picturesque. Along the shore the buildings with overhanging wooden balconies, the curious boats and sails, the picturesque costumes of the Greek and Turkish local craft, and the picturesque customs of the Greek and Turkish merchants, sailors, boatmen, and fishermen, make up a picture not easily edited from the minds of those who have seen it.

The port, however, is rapidly improving. The custom-house near the breakwater is a modern, well-built edifice; and near it is another large building, not quite completed, which, we believe, is intended for an hotel. Many of improvement are to be seen everywhere, and everybody appears to be busy. Heavily-laden boats are constantly leaving and entering the ships and the shore; the quays are piled with merchandise; vessels are being built and repaired wherever a one-sided position offers the opportunity, and a general appearance of content and activity and bustle prevails throughout the place.

There are not many antiquities at Smyrna. Phocæa, the Grand Cemetery, Nymphæum and Amphitrite. Phocæa, the native city of Pythagoras, and himself one of the earliest known instructor of Pythagoras, and himself one of the earliest known instructor of Pythagoras, and himself one of the earliest known Greek philosophers of the transmigration of the soul, was a Greek philosophers of the transmigration of the soul, was a native of Syria. The old town is chiefly inhabited by Roman Catholics native of Syria. The old town is chiefly inhabited by Roman Catholics descended from Genoese and Venetian settlers of the middle ages. The building which crowns the apex of the conical hill is the Church of St. George.

On the south-west side of the island lies the deserted harbour of Maria della Grazia. There is also the old fountain at which the nymphs of the island were accustomed to assemble, and where the nymphs of the island were accustomed to assemble, and where the maidens and young men of the island still meet to gossip and make love. The water from this fountain was used by the pilgrims of old, as it is by the modern pilgrims; and the spot is to this day held as in some degree sacred.

THE FARM.

THE weather has been much too wet and open to enable the farmers to bring their sheep and cattle into winter quarters, and, as many of them are obliged to thrash out for seeds and Christmas bills, it may well be down. Compared with other years, it is 15s. to 18s. 3d. to 1l. 1s. 6d. per cwt

NEW RAILWAY SCHEMES.

A list of plans and sections, amounting to 206 in number, for new railways has been deposited at the Board of Trade. The list relates exclusively to new schemes for railways, but hidden in a large variety of fresh projects for docks, harbours, ferries, and other works of improvement. We give a summary of the projects most interesting to Londoners:—

The Midland Railway Company propose to extend their Leicester and Hitchin line from Bedford to St. Albans, Edgware, Finchley, and London, terminating on the north side of London close by a junction with the Metropolitan Railway.

It is proposed to make a branch railway from the Midland main line, near the Gower-street Station, to the Euston Square Junction and Hampstead Junction and terminating by a junction with the Tottenham and Hampstead Junction and Metropolitan Railways. Also special powers for a metropolitan railway, to commence in Hampstead, Tottenham, and the Eastern Counties Railway.

A new railway from the Great Northern and King's-cross (Great Wind) railways, Piccadilly, and from Leicester-square to Hammersmith, and by other extensions to the proposed railway from Kensington, and by other extensions to the proposed railway from Kensington, and by other extensions to the proposed railway from Brentford, Ealing, and Hanwell, on the south side of the Thames, and other, the Lords, Chelsea, and Metropolitan Railway at West-street, Smithfield, having Metropolitan Railway at West-street, Smithfield, having Metropolitan Railway at West-street, Smithfield, having

In the interior of the building is a noble hall, occupying a vast square, which is carried right through the construction, and covered in at 70ft. from the ground by a glazed roof. It is in this hall that the major part of the artistic treasures of Ferrières, of inappreciable value, are kept. A library, containing more than 8000 volumes, Italian cabinets, collections of medals and precious stones, paintings by Velasquez, Van Dyck, Gueginon, &c., are arranged in this hall, in the upper part of which is an elegant gallery, ornamented with Gobelin tapestries. The gallery itself is reached by a wide stone staircase with ebony banisters, and decorated by two pictures by Snyders.

The principal of the state apartments is the grand salon Louis XVI., which is provided with two doors—one leading to an exterior colonnaded gallery decorated with frescoes and busts, and the other to the state dining-room, of a style that calls to mind the large chamber of the Knights of the Garter at Windsor Castle. It was in this salle-à-manger that the déjeûner offered to Napoleon III. by Baron Rothschild took place.

A special train had been ordered at Paris by the Baron for the Emperor, who quickly reached the station of Ozoer-la-Ferrière, accompanied by Count Walewski, Count Persigny, MM. Fould, Drouyn de Lhuys, Boitelle (Prefect of Police), General Fleury, M. Edgar Ney, Lord Cowley, Prince Metternich, Count d'Espeuilles (Aide-de-Camp), and Baron Delsarge, his Majesty's gunbearer. At the station the Baron's equipages were in waiting to receive the party, and his Majesty at once took his place in a magnificent open carriage drawn by four horses, conducted by two postillions. Five other carriages, all drawn by thoroughbreds, conveyed the remainder of the guests to the château, at the summit of which, as soon as the august party arrived, the Imperial flag was immediately hoisted. After visiting the great financier's château the Emperor proceeded to inspect the home park, where he planted a fir-tree (of the description known by the appellation Wellingtonia), intended to serve as a souvenir of his visit. The déjeûner followed this promenade; of the menu we know nothing, but the display of plate and Sèvres porcelain was unique, both as to value and to the good taste so characteristic of all the Baron's acquisitions.

After breakfast, during which the Emperor had on his right the Baroness James, and on his left the Baroness Nathaniel de Rothschild, the illustrious guests started for a couple of hours' shooting in the rich and night-and-day guarded preserves, where the sport was excellent; 939 pheasants, 5 hares, and 2 snipes were the official account of the game killed. On the return to the château at half-past five the Emperor was enthusiastically received in the courtyard by the populations of the neighbourhood, headed by their Curés and Mayors. A collation had been prepared in the hall, the gallery of which was occupied by the chorus from the Opera, who sang a hunting-piece composed expressly for the occasion by Rossini. When the Emperor gave the signal of departure, the gamekeepers, piqueurs, and household, with lighted torches, formed into two lines for the passage of the Imperial cortège from the porch of the château to the gates of the forest, of which the whole route up to the railway-station was illuminated a giorno. The twenty miles back to Paris were promptly accomplished, and the fatigues of the day did not prevent the Emperor from conferring another well-merited honour on the same day by "assisting," with the Empress, at the thousandth performance of "La Dame Blanche" at the Opéra Comique, where the bust of its still living composer, Boieldieu, was crowned, with much ceremony, in the course of the evening.

In consequence of the absence of all the gentlemen Rothschilds from Paris, Mdme. Gustave de Rothschild had the signature of the financial documents issued by the "version" of the Rue Laffite on that 16th of December, a day which will certainly remain henceforth red-lettered in the calendar of the Rothschild family.

THE HON. JUGONNATH SUNKERSETT, PRESIDENT OF THE VICTORIA AND ALBERT MUSEUM COMMITTEE, BOMBAY.

THE VICTORIA MUSEUM AND GARDENS, BOMBAY.

THE ceremony of laying the corner-stone of the Victoria and Albert Museum, and of the opening of the Agri-Horticultural Society's New Gardens at Bombay, took place on the 19th of November last. We abridge from the Bombay journals an account of the event. The site of the museum and of the gardens is on the Mount estate, the old North Mount-road being now the central avenue of the gardens. The museum is being built on the northern side of this road, close to the Parell-road, being just opposite the Waterworks Office. A triumphal arch of palm-branches was erected across the entrance to Mount-road. The museum is already about 40ft. above the ground, having been raised to the plinth. The whole surface of its area (180ft. by 80ft.) was temporarily boarded over; and at the end opposite the corner-stone a dais was erected, with seats for his Excellency the Governor and Lady Frere. Chairs were placed in the form of a theatre on the platform to accommodate 2000 spectators. In front of the building the Royal standard was hoisted. The first visitors began to arrive about three p.m., and by four o'clock the gardens and all the roads in the neighbourhood were crowded with people. Amongst those present were the Hon. Mr. and Miss Frere, the Hon. Mr. and Mrs. Inverarity, Sir Alexander and Lady Grant, the Hon. Messrs. Newton, Couch, and Hebbert, the Hon. Mr. and Mrs. Robertson, the the Hon. Mr. and Mrs. Tristram, the the Hon. Mr. and Mrs. Scott, the Persian Consul, and his Highness Aga Khan. The Governor, with Lady Frere and Staff, arrived at five p.m., and was saluted with a blast of trumpets. His Excellency and Lady Frere were received by the Hon. Jugonnath Sunkersett, President, and the members of the Victoria and Albert Museum committee, and led to "Rule Britannia." Mr. Jugonnath Sunkersett, surrounded by the committee, then addressed his Excellency in a vigorous speech, in which he gave a concise history of the Victoria and Albert Museum. Sir Bartle Frere replied, and at the conclusion of his address his Excellency, followed by the committee, proceeded to lay the corner-stone of the building. A large copper box was placed under the stone, in which were placed a set of current coins, copies of the daily newspapers of the morning, and of the weekly papers of the last date of publication, and of the proceedings of the public meeting of Dec. 15, 1858, at which the museum was proposed, together with a roll of the president and members of the committee, and a copy of the Queen's proclamation, given by Sir Bartle Frere.

On the lid of the box was the following inscription:—"On Wednesday, the 19th day of November, 1862, in the 25th year of the reign of her Most Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, his Excellency the Right Honourable the Earl of Elgin and Kincardine, K.T., G.C.B., K.S.I., being Viceroy and Governor-General of India, his Excellency Sir Henry Bartle Edward Frere, K.C.B., Governor of Bombay, laid the chief corner-stone of the Victoria and Albert Museum, to be erected by the inhabitants of Bombay, in testimony of their loyal affection, and in memory of the assumption by her Majesty of the direct Sovereignty of India, proclaimed November 1st, 1858. The Hon. Jugonnath Sunkersett, President of the Museum and Gardens Committee; Rhan Daji, Esq., G.G.M.C.; G. C. M. Birdwood, Esq., M.D., Honorary Joint Secretaries. William Loudon, Esq., Sheriff of Bombay; William Tracey, Esq., Architect." The stone having been slowly lowered down into its resting-place, his Excellency, after trying it with the plumb-line, declared it duly laid, and the band struck up "God Save the Queen."

The Hon. Jugonnath Sunkersett then, as President of the Agri-Horticultural Society of Western India, with the other office-bearers of the society, conducted Lady Frere through their new gardens. At the end of the grand promenade, under a date grove, the children of the Students' Scientific and Literary Society's girls' schools were gathered under the direction of Rao Sahib Wishwannath Narayen Mundlik, the Secretary to, and Dr. Rhan Daji, the president of the society; and here her Ladyship, after some formalities had been gone through, declared the gardens open under the name of "The Victoria Gardens" of the Agri-Horticultural Society.

The assembly then broke up and dispersed through the gardens, the Governor's band playing a selection of operatic pieces.

The Hon. Jugonnath Sunkersett, whose Portrait we give above, is well known in Bombay, and, indeed, throughout the Presidency, for his liberal and enlightened philanthropy. He is about fifty-eight years old, and his activity and zeal are pretty strongly shown by the following long list of offices which he fills:—He is a Legislative Councillor, one of her Majesty's justices of the peace, president of the Victoria and Albert Museum, president of the Agri-Horticultural Society of Western India, Fellow of the Bombay University, Fellow of the Royal Asiatic Society of London, member of the Bombay branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, member of the Bombay Geographical Society, President of the Bombay Association, vice-president of the David Sassoon School of Industry, member of the Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy School of Art, director of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company, trustee of the Elphinstone Funds, member of the committee appointed by Government for the management of the Hill Station of Matheran, chairman of the Bombay Native Dispensary, chairman of the Framjee Cowrasjee Institute, and chairman of the Fort Proprietary School.

DEMETRIOS BOULGARIS, PRESIDENT OF THE GREEK PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE GREEK GOVERNMENT.

DEMETRIOS BOULGARIS, President of the Provisional Government of Greece, was well known as a stanch opponent of the late dynasty in Greece, and was one of the most active among the organisers and leaders which upset it. He is a native of Hydra, and is aged about sixty-three. He was first a member of the Greek Administration in 1833, President of the Ministry in 1855-9, and for many years a Senator.

THE GREEK ELECTION IN LONDON.

THE general voting of all Greek citizens in London for the election of the King of Greece commenced at the office of the Consul-General, in Gracechurch-street, on Thursday, Dec. 18, and lasted for ten days consecutively—occupying an hour each day, from one to two. On Sunday and on Christmas Day the voting took place at the vestry-room of the Greek church in London-wall. The following notification of the result of the voting has been forwarded to us from the office of Mr. Ionides, Greek Consul-General in London:—"The voting of the Greek subjects in London for the election of the King of Greece has terminated this day (26th) at the offices of the Consulate-General of Greece. One hundred and thirty-nine members of the Greek community have registered their votes, all without exception for Prince Alfred of England; but of these 129 have voted without indicating any alternative, six have named Prince Wilhelm of Denmark, three 'a Republican form of Government,' and one 'Joseph Garibaldi,' as eligible in the event of Prince Alfred not accepting the throne of Greece."

SELECT MEDICAL OPINIONS.

SIR JOSEPH OLLIFFE, M.D.,

Physician to the British Embassy at Paris.

"I have frequently prescribed Dr. de Jongh's Light-brown Cod-liver Oil, and I have every reason to be satisfied with its beneficial and salutary effects."

DR. LETHEBY

Medical Officer of Health to the City of London.

"It is, I believe, unquestionably the purest and best. Dr. de Jongh's Light-brown Cod-liver Oil has great therapeutic power; and, from my former analyses, I have no hesitation in declaring it to be a pure and unadulterated article."

DR. LAWRANCE,

Physician to H.R.H. the Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha.

"I invariably prescribe Dr. de Jongh's Oil in preference to any other, feeling assured that I am recommending a genuine article, which may be taken by the most delicate stomach. I speak from the EFFICACY OF THIS INVALUABLE REMEDIUM IS UNIVERSAL."

MESSRS. SWAN and EDGAR, having been the successful Prize Medal Warehousemen throughout the kingdom, are unhesitatingly favourable for the past year in the French silk trade, to announce that the unsold portion of their Stock, a very large one of several eminent manufacturers, have the honour to announce that they have purchased at a very large reduction in price from the Paris Trade on hand, at the judgment moment for the manufacture of first-class silks, amounting in value to a very large sum, they will offer them for sale on considerably under the present value.
Those who will favour us with a call will be enabled, as nearly as possible, to judge with confidence, as being not only the largest lot, but the cleanest in respect of style and quality, as well as the cheapest ever offered in the trade, the sole cause of the great reduction in price being the depressed condition of the trade in consequence of the scarcity of manufactures to dispose of an accumulation of stock, for which during the past year there has been no room in the warehouses.
SWAN and EDGAR, Prize Medal Warehousemen, Nos. 29, 41, 43, 47, 49, 51, Regent-quadrant; and 9, 10, 11, Piccadilly, a few days' walk from the Haymarket, where the entire lot is ready, which cannot be contact then Monday, Jan. 5.

LONDON: Printed and Published at the Office, 198, Strand, in the Parish of St. Clement Danes, in the County of Middlesex, by JOHN CRACKNELL, of No. 13, Clarence-terrace, Regent's-park.—SATURDAY JANUARY 3, 1863.

THE NATIONAL PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

WE present this week an Engraving of the new offices of the National Provident Institution, which was one of the earliest associations for life assurance founded on the mutual as distinguished from the proprietary principle. The history of this society affords a striking example of the manner in which private enterprise is developed in this country. Its growth during the twenty-seven years of its existence has been surprising. It would be, perhaps, too trifle a remark were we to say that public confidence and this institution have advanced together; but certain it is that, owing to the support which a bold and prudent direction has drawn to it, it has now become, perhaps, the most important of modern companies. The number of policies in force at the present date, after the payment of a million and a quarter to the families of deceased members, is about 26,000. After the first seven years of its existence the capital amounted to £139,806; it now amounts to £2,200,086; or, by the addition of the balance of profit-and-loss account for the five years ending November, 1862, it may be stated as £2,200,426. In the year 1843 the income of the National Provident Institution was £44,219; in 1857 it was £278,341; and we find, from a report issued on the 9th ult., that it has now reached £324,731, having increased £40,309 in five years. The details of the declared surpluses are not less striking facts in connection with this company; at least, we suppose they are not so to policy holders. As the whole of the profits are the property of the assured, being from time to time divided amongst them, and not absorbed by proprietary of any kind, it is to be supposed that the quinquennial periods appointed for the declaration of bonuses are looked forward to with no little anxiety. The directors, happily, have been always able to meet their constituents on these occasions with overflowing hands. The affairs have been well managed, and the profits of this joint-stock or co-operative venture have abounded. The latest declared surplus was £345,034. This immense sum was paid away in 1857, and the directors have already announced that early in 1863 the gains of another five years will be likewise divided amongst the fortunate members of this thriving company.

The business of the National Provident Institution was at first conducted in a small office in Nicholas-lane. In 1842 the books were removed to No. 48, Gracechurch-street; but henceforth the structure presented to the notice of the reader is to serve as the home of this institute.

NEW OFFICES OF THE NATIONAL PROVIDENT INSTITUTION IN EASTCHEAP.

This building, erected on the freehold of the company, and standing upon a square, with one front in Eastcheap and another in Gracechurch-street, is one of the noblest edifices ever erected for this class of business in London. Professor Kerr, a man of patient and laborious research, has shown in the design of this building that he can plan as well as theorise. He has not been backward in years past to express his opinions as to the principles which should guide the architect; but now, from his chair at King's College, he steps down to give a practical illustration—a strict diagram, in fact—which shall incontestably demonstrate, and that to a larger audience than that which crowds the class room, the truth and value of his teachings. Some years ago Mr. Kerr wrote as follows:—

"The requirements of a building must be made fundamental in the arrangement of it, and therefore in the arrangement of the architectural design; and this has concealed in it much that does not at first appear. It is a fault that we arrange our plans too much by models and too little by requirement as a fundamental; and I am convinced that if the true arrangements for the ends in view were to be carefully examined into there would arise a variety in general and particular ideas of plan, map, and detail, which would not only be valuable but surprising."

On entering the building and ranging from story to story one is impressed with the feeling that the house has been made for the family, not the family made to accommodate itself to the house. The architect first set himself to plan for the comfort of the occupants, next to render their dwelling beautiful as well as convenient. Hence has arisen one of the most pleasing structures we ever entered.

The ground occupied is about 3600 square feet. The two frontages measure something like 60ft. each. In the basement dry and commodious fireproof rooms are secured for the safe custody of the constantly-accumulating deeds and securities of the institution, &c. The first floor is, as usual, devoted to general business; the second story contains the boardroom, secretary's and medical attendants' rooms, &c.; in the third we find another suite of offices, while a series of apartments are constructed in the roof, as may be seen by the dormer windows. All the floors are constructed on Barrett's fireproof patent; the enrichments of the ceilings and walls are executed in Parian cement; the exterior is of stone. It would be difficult to say in what style it is executed, and it may be perhaps sufficient to remark that great originality is apparent in the detail, which harmonises in the most agreeable manner with the general design. The conception of the whole strikes the observer as fresh and vigorous. Great credit is due to the Messrs. Myers and Sons, of Lambeth, the builders, for having done their part of the work so well; and to Mr. Rudock for having given such careful attention to the stone carving.

The Madras Athenæum, of November 28, says:—"The opening of the East Indian Railway to Patna, distant 403 miles from Calcutta, is an accomplished fact, and marks an important era in the history of railway enterprise in India. Ere our present Issue is in the hands of our English readers a further section of 137 miles in the distance between Patna and Benares—will also be opened; and it is anticipated that the extension to Mirzapore, distant 522 miles from Calcutta, will be completed by the end of January. How largely the public interests will be advantaged by the opening up of those important districts it is impossible to over estimate."

THE BATTLE OF FREDERICKSBURG.

The New York Times appears to contain the best account of the great battle which took place at Fredericksburg on the 13th of December. The account is dated Fredericksburg, 15th of December. We copy copious extracts :—

THE THEATRE OF OPERATIONS.

The theatre of operations to-day extended from Fredericksburg on the right, and down the south side of the Rappahannock nearly two miles. Immediately behind the town of Fredericksburg the land rises for forty or fifty yards, running towards the above-named line of hills, but left for about a quarter of forming a ridge of ground which runs along the line of the Hazel River, a sullky, which flows at the foot of the hills. Behind the ridge and the sullky which empties into the Rappahannock seven miles above Fredericksburg, is a ridge near the aforesaid line, about a mile and a-half from the river, and divided with rebel batteries. To the right, along and up the river, are ridges of high ground, which, however, are not so prominent; and here, too, batteries were placed on every advantageous position. Behind the hills, where a second line of batteries, and then a second range of wooded hills, where a second line of fortifications was placed. Between the rear of the left grand division of the Army of the Potomac and the river, there is a comparatively open plain.

A word now on the scene of operations of the left grand division. From the lower part of the town the ridge on which it is built rises gradually until the highest point of the ridge is reached, which stretches for some to be a comparatively open undulating country, with a course almost due south. Six miles down the Rappahannock. About a couple of miles back of the town is a range of low hills, and a point a mile and a half below Fredericksburg two pontoons had been thrown across on Thursday morning, and on Friday the whole of the left grand division, under the command of Major-General Franklin, had marched over the river. Daylight of Saturday morning found them drawn up in battle array on the plain skirting the Rappahannock.

The battle-ground, though very mainly in some places, presented a fine field for military operations. The ground, running from the Fredericksburg road about half a mile from, and nearly parallel to, the river. Beyond is the railroad, and, still further, the wooded range of hills in which the rebel batteries were strongly intrenched. About a mile and a half from Fredericksburg, nearly on the river edge, is situated a large and handsome mansion, after the English style.

DISPOSITION OF THE TROOPS.

The line of battle, as it appeared in the morning, was as follows :—The 6th Army Corps, under General W. Franklin (old force), on the left, the extreme speed of three divisions. The 1st Army Corps (General Reynolds's) extending still further to the left, following order—General Meade's division only, and still further to the right, connecting with General Howe's, General Meade's division on the left, connecting with General Howe's, General Meade's division centre, and General Gibbon's division on the right, fronting to the railroad, nearly on the same line. This constituted the order in which our forces were drawn up, there being three divisions in each corps.

Opposite the right, under General Sumner, was the rebel left, under command of General Longstreet. Opposed to the left, under General Franklin, was the rebel right, under General Jackson. General Lee, Generalissimo of the Southern army, was in person in command of the Confederate forces.

The plan of General Burnside, agreed upon in council of war, was to overpower the rebel centre. Early on the morning of Saturday the endeavour to carry out that scheme was made. At 9 a.m. the battle-ground was given that Sumner's right should be extended until it reached Franklin's centre and if necessary, should be extended until it reached Franklin's left—thus forming a continuous line of battle from the river on the right to the left resting on the river at the point where the lower pontoons cross, and the right on Fredericksburg.

The fight on the left, the whole of Franklin's command (59,000 men), which then be strong round so as a plan, and the battle commenced in earnest. It was heard, prove a most handsome enterprise, and one of which there is no succeeded if it was decided that the left grand division (the late command of the right and left, according to the programme, would admit of practical execution, and was accordingly resorted to.

About half-past eleven o'clock I crossed the Rappahannock on the upper pontoon-bridge, and proceeded to the town of Fredericksburg, and to the main street. At this time brisk skirmishing was going on in the outskirts of the town. The rebel infantry-pickets, stationed in rifle-pits on the side of the ground or new skirmishers-of-fire, so to speak. At four o'clock Reserves to the right, and, according to the programme, would admit of practical execution,

MUSIC.

In an old geographical work descriptive of Ireland there is a chapter entitled "On Snakes," and the chapter is as follows: "There are no snakes in Ireland." So our head "Music" in our present Number must almost simply to this: "There has been no music this week." In truth, musical entertainments are entirely in abeyance during the Christmas holidays, and those who seek for pleasure-seeking public being engrossed by the pantomimes given nightly by every theatre, great and small, in London. Even at our great musical theatre, the Royal English Opera, Mr. Byron's brilliant and successful burlesque, "Beauty and the Beast," is the chief attraction; the opera itself being merely played as secondary matters, curtailed and hurried through, so as to interfere as little as possible with the enjoyments of the comic speculation. When the edge of the pantomime is taken off, and the theatre returns to its regular course, we may expect the production of Balfe's new opera, which has been for some time in preparation at that house, of which we have reason to believe, will be one of his best and most successful productions.

THE THEATRES.

PANTOMIMES AND BURLESQUES.

People in general are apt to regard public amusements as slight affairs not demanding particular attention. Nothing, however, in the world is so trifling as not to deserve remark. The happiness of life is composed of small items, and idle words and minute accidents have more influence on our destiny and our daily comfort than things that seem of more importance. Great cities and catastrophes are welcome sometimes as the agitated modes of deliverance from dull monotony and petty annoyance. Our pleasures, however simple, have also their tendencies, and affect our satisfaction with the present state of our existence. In corroboration of these remarks we would add another, pregnant with much reflection, that the philosophical historian is compelled to record the absence of dramatic literature in a country generally taken by the course of public amusements. Look at the beginnings of the drama and the distinctions between the sacred and bacchanalian, the song and the sublime tragedy of "King Lear." It is remarkable, too, of late years, in regard to certain modern institutions connected with the drama, how by little and little they have changed and transformed from entertainments of an objectionable character to others unobjectionable as intellectual recreations. Such are saloons and hippodromes from open to regular theatres; and music-halls promise at no distant day to become decent concert-rooms. This principle of development is also manifested in the present state of one of the chief entertainments—namely, the pantomimes and burlesques that are very popular during the Christmas holidays. The first pantomime the pantomime was a thing of dumb-show. The first speaking pantomime was produced at Covent Garden in 1830; but even then the dialogue was not in rhyme, but in prose. Mr. Payne and afterwards Mr. Keeley, played in it. The novelty was entitled "Harlequin Pat, Harlequin Jack, and the Giant's Causeway." Now rhyme in pantomimes is written by literary men of great talent, and their composition has culminated into a distinct profession. It is true that this year we have had "Harlequin and Humpty Dumpty," by Mr. Boucicault, his rewrite to the old style of thing; but this evidently has been done for the purpose of showing the power of pantomime also: but it is not likely that it will grow into a practice, or even be continued beyond the immediate occasion. Of that pantomime we gave a descriptive account in our Number for January 4, 1862, and these productions from which we now present pictorial illustrations.

Drury Lane.—We can report the complete success of Mr. E. L. Blanchard's pantomime entitled "Two-Sides," at Drury Lane, giving any further account of this in many respects remarkable production to the reader of our previous Number. We will add to this new issue, Mr. Edmund Falconer, who has remodelled nearly the entire interior of the house. Not only has the rotunda been divided out in front of the pit, but the auditorium has been entirely remodelled. The promenade behind the boxes no longer exists, but has been thrown into the boxes themselves, which are now furnished with chairs up to the wall. The panelling in front is now substituted by the arabesque trellework, or interlaced ribbing, in the style of Louis the Fourteenth, and which is the pattern of the Imperial palace at Versailles. The credit of this is due, we are told, to Mr. Marshall Nelson, of Parliament-street, who was the idea originated, and who has carried it through with exemplary perseverance. The paper on the walls and the upholstery of the house consist of a deep blue colour, relieved by the crimson of the boxes, and the gross circle forms an immense balcony, in which, as we have said, the audience is accommodated with chairs. The second tier is similarly arranged, with the addition of an artistic vista, terminating in the grand saloon. A new chandelier is suspended from the ceiling, and from the upper tiers of boxes will be hung a project, with ground-glass shades. The orchestral stalls are formed of crimson velvet-cover and extend to the centre of the pit circle. Finally, her Majesty's box and retiring-apartments have been carefully put in order, and it is hoped will ere long be honoured with the Royal presence. It is right to add to the above remarks that the pantomime that we rendered last week. We should have pointed out, however, that in the transformation of the two clowns, "Grimaldi only the tale of "Goody Two Shoes" but also that of "Cock Robin." That these have been somewhat arbitrarily associated we must confess, but the author has succeeded well in the task. The opera with Little Goody (Miss Lydia Thompson) keeping school. Little Pet (Miss Selina Dolaro) is the village coquette, and Squire and, what is more, helps her in distress, when Sir Timothy Grips (Mr. Tom Matthews) persecutes her with his attentions, and, because rejected, seizes on her for rent. The fairy Good Nature (Miss Lizzie Eaton) comes to the shepherd's aid, and provides him with a never-decreasing stock of bank-notes wherewith to satisfy the rent-collectors, is compelled to a temporary retreat in the forest, and there dreams of his love, Little Pet, in the enchanted Hall, and herself being Forget-me-not. And for this scene Mr. Oscar Byrne has composed and arranged a "Ballet des Bouquets," in which Miss Lydia Thompson and the Misses Dolaro display their graceful manner of dancing, and after comes the celebration of May Day; and then follows the episode of the death of Cock Robin (Cock Robert Grimaldi) and his burial at Sparrow. But Mr. Blanchard has not been willing to leave the subject here: but, rising on poet-wing, esteems Cock Robin as a veritable Christian, and, true to the Good Nature, we have a procession on barricaded path of prisms over the world." The transformation scene has nothing, however, remarkable in its construction, and then the Nave of the Great Exhibition under the eastern dome. The scenery of the opening is magnificently painted; but two scenes especially require notice. First, the Bramble Bank in the Enchanted Hall of the Forest; and second, the Haunt of the Woodnymphs, which exhibits a fertile and luxuriant growth of forest-trees, rocks, mountain and superb cascades. The harlequinade consists of six scenes, some of which are ingeniously contrived, and many consist of patented and registered inventions. Altogether this pantomime is a superior production, and equal to the best ever produced at the national theatre. The house was crowded to excess on the first night, and nearly as many were turned away from the doors unable to gain admission. The last act of the company last week; we have only on this to say that all acted admirably well. The house was crowded fully carried through without a hitch: the whole, indeed, was a brilliant triumph.

Covent Garden.—This theatre was also crowded to the ceiling on Boxing Night. Mr. H. G. Pyne, as our readers have been already informed, has selected the old story of "Beauty and the Beast" for his punning opening. He commences with an allegory, in which the captive Prince is tempted by the Gnome Queen, but remains unseduced by the attractions of Wine, Youth, and Beauty. In her rage the changes him to a Beast. It is, however, stipulated by a Good Fairy, in whose favour the Prince has a have share, that should any maiden be found to love him he should regain his original form. This condition Mr. Byron fulfils in his own way. He introduces us to Squire Tuddlywinks and his man-servant Muddlehead, who, on returning home in a gig, are driven by a high wind into an enchanted wood. These worthies were represented by Mr. W. H. Payne and Mr. F. Payne, who, by their acting, contributed to the fun of the scene, which was also aided by the scene itself, the trees in which are literally alive with action. So likewise are the chairs and tables in the next scene—the Palace of the Beast—the magic hospitalities of which they partake. But the Squire, having plucked a rose as a present for his daughter Beauty (Miss Louisa Pyne), is made to promise the Beast (Mrs. Aynsley Cook) that he will return to his home with the fair child for whom he had committed the otherwise unpardonable trespass. The promise is kept, the poor girl is left with her father, and the Beast returns home. In the act is more than a gorgeous scene has been painted by Mr. W. Callcott and a grand transformation invented by Mr. W. H. Payne. Mrs. Aynsley Cook's beauty is permitted a visit to her father, whom she finds to have become whimsically distraught, and who, accompanied by Pets staff of office, returns home with the maiden to the Beast. Here they find the Beast dead, having been poisoned by the Gnome Queen. And here the young lady's feelings are heaved with divine compassion. Pity is akin to love, and love soon makes its presence felt. Beauty, in agony, wishes for the poor Beast's restoration to life, that she may love and bless him. The prayer is granted, and the Beast rises in his own proper shape, and the good fairy, Sunshine, delivers an epilogue in praise of the Queen. Mr. W. H. Payne's pantomime, as we have said, has excelled himself. It presents the strong contrasts of moonlight and sunshine, and the result of the combination is perfectly delicious. The general effect is, in fact, a new illustration, and the scenery, including the names of the performers, nothing remains to add but that the pantomime has been eminently successful, and the comic business, as it is called, irresistibly amusing.

The Princess.—The pantomime at this theatre is one of the best of the season, and an indubitably great success. Mr. E. T. Blanchard is the author, and his attributes have been in no measure than is usual with him. He has treated the subject of Prince Prettypet and the Yellow Dwarf, on course, and the author has selected for the story advances. The scenery, which is by Mr. Beverley, is charming. One is remarkable for its quality and beauty, and which has been chosen for illustration. Mother Bunch (Miss Rosina Rubio) Rusch to a field of enormous mushrooms, under which her imps are concealed, and which suddenly open, and the fairy Queen Mab appears and silver helmet—who come forward in a ballet. And this beautiful scene is followed by another still more beautiful, in which Mother Bunch and the fairy Queen Mab appear in the midst of a lake of water-lilies, and who delight us with a second ballet. The burlesque scene is entitled "Puss in Boots, or, Harlequin Dumbuffo, and the Rumpaceous, King of Little Britteny, and the father of the silly Princess Jessamine, who excited immense laughter. Mr. Charles Sexton, as the ugly but intellectual Prince, was lively and amusing. The scene of the kitchen in which the cooking is going on for Prince Prettypet's wedding, with the introduction of the Fairy Queen Mab, is a fertile and felicitous. Such a mode of wooing is surely irresistible. But a more beautiful scene is that which succeeds, in which Dumbuffo, the humours of a harlequinade, and therefore a transformation is requisite—one so complex and beautiful, and so thoroughly exhibiting the resources of the art of scene-painting, that no description can be also good. The production of a Christmas-piece, so perfect in all its departments, must have a beneficial effect on the fortunes of the new management, which has certainly commenced with spirit, and, we trust, will secure an ultimate triumph.

Adelphi.—Here, as we have already intimated, Mr. Byron has produced a new piece, which he entitles an Arabian Tale, and a dream, by making the spirit of Folly (Miss Woolgar) assume the shape of Mrs. Nickleby, and the hero of the piece, Mr. Jones, who likewise slightly elevated his hero, calling him George de Barnwell, who, having ambitious views, has been to neglect Maria, his sweetheart (Miss Fanny Josephs), for Lucy Lockit (Miss E. Farren), a rich customer. She is, however, not over-honest, as she calls at the shop with a false account, which Maria pays. This is the first act, and the heart of the susceptible George, but certain valuable articles from Thoroughgood's stock. These she afterwards seeks to pledge with Mr. Moneybond Isaacs (Mr. Rogers), but is detected, and Maria promises the felony by marrying the delinquent. She takes time to reflect, and meets Sir Lucy de Lacy (Mr. Addison), whom, however, she instigates him to kill his uncle. From the horrors consequent on this temptation, Barnwell suddenly awakes, rejoicing that it was only a dream, and determines to marry Maria, and to lead an honest walking. Finding also that Millwood has married a nobleman, he leaves the shop, and, in the next scene, is represented as asleep in the Haunt of the Dryads, is one of great brilliancy, and does infinite credit to Mr. Beverley's invention and power of execution. The acting of Mr. Toole and Miss Woolgar is extremely good. The first stated that the harlequinade derived great benefit from the wonderful antics and grotesqueries of Mr. Toole, and Miss Woolgar, in the character of fairy drama of "Blothemago," at the Théâtre Impérial du Chatelet, named Arthur and Bertband, whose tricks and contortions were really astonishing.

Haymarket.—The re-engagement of Mr. Sothern would be of itself sufficient to ensure the continued prosperity of this house, even without the addition of Mr. Buckstone's new extravaganza, but with it there is good reason to believe that the success of the Christmas season will be of a most lasting one. Where we not much disposed, perhaps, from the subject of "Dundreary" in London, and there was much need for the addition of "Dundreary" to eke out its slender material, but the extravaganza is so entirely original, and so full of the inexhaustible humour of the original sequent turns to account. There was no lack of material for the author's invention. It is founded on the germ which, when taken up into his own mind, would grow to any required dimensions. Messrs. O'Connor, Morris, and their assistants have also lent their important aid to the development of the whole subject, and have placed the Happy Valley on the stage in the most picturesque manner. Mr. Buckstone has done his part well, and the young Prince to perfection, and uttered the puns with which the dialogue is garnished with wonderful vivacity and point. Mr. Compton, Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Howe, Mr. Rogers, Mr. Chippendale, and Mr. Compton, with his polyglot puns, as punning as he was accustomed to be, and Mr. Howe, Mr. Chippendale, Mr. Rogers, and Mr. Farren genius, was equally remarkable both in his vanity and his ambition. Mr. W. Farren, as the chief of Arab banditti, was also highly demonstrative of his extraordinary talent. Mr. Sothern was Winter, as Nebuzzle, the sister of Rosalie; to Miss Rouse, as Dolcini, and the stage-manager, Mr. Ashley, as Lord Dundreary's valet, Binjamin, and to Miss Linsley, as Zilla. But we must reserve the highest praise to Mr. Tilbury, who, in Dr. Johnson as Chorus, had, after all, the most difficult part to play, and played it with the skill of a master. The farce was equally successful, and the comic business, as it is called, irresistibly amusing.

Olympic.—Mr. F. C. Bernard has contributed to this theatre one of his best pieces for the Boxing Night, and has been also careful to select a good subject whereon to exercise his skill. Indeed, this is a "name to conjure with. We were glad to see that Mr. Akins has not abandoned his first drama, in which he represented Sir Sir Gilbert de Mountfalcon. Miss Latimer, also a new appearance at this theatre, was received with a hearty welcome. Her songs and duets interspersed with the usual "Dundreary" were encored; all were applauded. Mr. Horace Wigan, as Lady Clara Steward, was very good. Mr. Addison, as Sir Lucy de Lacy, and his face a complete mask, wearing abundantly the usual signs of a good farce. The opening scene of the fairy ring is very striking, and that of the grounds of Clare Castle is admirable as an example of stage perspective.

Polytechnic Institution.—Among the pantomimes of the reason we must not forget to mention the dissolving-view spectacular, which is produced at the Polytechnic Institution. This, as a pantomime this performance is excellent, and includes some new effects which will ensure its complete popularity. The pictures, executed on glass by Messrs. Childe and Hill and Mr. Knott, were designed by George Hine, Esq., and are all in exquisite taste. Mr. George Buckland describes the incidents in verse and prose, in song and narrative, with his accustomed efficiency. Professor Pepper, too, in "A Strange Lecture," explains some of the wonders produced by the "Photodrome," a new and beautiful optical apparatus invented and constructed by Thomas Rose, Esq., of Glasgow, which causes phantoms to appear at will, so as to produce the fullest impression of their reality, though at the same time a real body will pass through them. A new source of illusion is thus prepared for the stage, and will, no doubt, be taken advantage of by experienced managers.

Royal Gallery of Illustration.—Mr. and Mrs. Germon Reed resumed their performance on Monday of "The Family Legend," which, notwithstanding that it has already run for two hundred and forty nights, yet retains its attractions apparently unimpaired. Mrs. Reed appeared also in a particularly novel character, "An Old Servant in a New Place," in which she introduced a popular domestic ballad with excellent effect. Mr. Percy Roselle treated us with a musical version of a domestic scene, entitled "Mrs. Roselle's Little Evening Party," which was received with great applause. The scenery has been retouched by Messrs. Grieve and Telbin, and now looks as beautiful as ever.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

Luminous Worms.—In the last number of the Proceedings of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Liverpool is an extract from a letter from Mr. W. Harrison, who has recently constituted one of the curators of the local fury, to the Rev. H. Higgins, the President. Mr. Harrison says that on Saturday night, at eight o'clock, he went with Mr. Weldon to a locality remarked the appearance of luminous particles moving in the grass of a meadow, and which were known, from their size, to be worms. Some three-quarters of an inch in length, being nothing more, so far as he could discern, than young earthworms. Mr. Harrison adds, "It was not the worm itself that was luminous, but something adhering to it, a rude form various parts of its body. On lifting up some of the worms with a pin, portions of the luminous matter accompanied it, and the ground was left into smaller pieces. Each light lasted about ten minutes. It was very interesting to see the worms apparently running about all over the walk. On throwing the light of a lamp on any one of these moving lights, the head that is was conveyed its way by a brisk, serpentine species of which were thus engaged, and every one fought hard before it would allow me to put it into the box. I found also that the worms required to be wounded before they emitted light. Accordingly, by the aid of a pencil, I found that were not injured, but, on touching, and taking them one by one. I pricked them with a pin; the result was that each of them shone brightly for a few minutes, during the whole evening, and every one they attacked produced light. The specimens taken continued to shine for a long time after they were put into spirits. So numerous were the phosphorescent particles on one occasion that they stuck to the feet of a dog, and, as he trotted along before me, left a luminous track on the short intervening sequence. The president of the Entomological Society informs me that the luminous property of the worms is due to certain phosphorescent glandular structures; and that the phenomenon has been noticed in other parts of the kingdom, where the worms are called "glow-worms." Specimens have been identified as Stronyse modiles, Gyerion oleus, and Nelesis brevicilus." Mr. Harrison remarks that the luminous Oreophilus colonies is well known to be luminous; but that the worms sent to him from Walton were not residents of any part of the country with which he was acquainted. Dr. Leaniceps, Orophilus subterraneus is common in the district. Mr. Higgins adds that the phenomenon is not confined to the species of worms so extremely agile, and most unlikely to permit themselves to be wounded by bodies.

Thallium.—A report on the discovery and properties of this new metal was read by M. Dumas at a recent meeting of the Academy of Sciences at Paris. It is due to M. Crookes, and dates from 1861. It was the first to see (on March 30, 1861) the characteristic green ray of thallium in the spectrum of the residue of a certain quantity of certain specimens of selenium, which he had found in the products of a piece of Lipari sulphur and in some Hartz pyrites, and which he had submitted to a process for the extraction of the precious metals. No one, on the other hand, can contest that M. Lamy was the first to obtain the metal in a metallic state, and that it is to him that we are indebted to tellurium and selenium, as Mr. Crookes thought, but a true metal. We have not space to follow M. Dumas in the details he supplied, but add, that M. Dumas remarks that "thallium is destined to make an epoch in the history of chemistry by the numerous analogies which it presents with the chemical characters and physical properties. It is no exaggeration to say that, with regard to the atomic weight, as well as to the salts it forms, thallium offers a notice of contradictory properties which justify its being termed the connecting link between the metals of alkalies." Among the physical properties, thallium is placed at the opposite extremity of a scale of which lithium constitutes the first term, and which includes all the metals which fill different degrees. These weights are:—Lithium, 7; sodium, 23; potassium, 39; thallium, 204; lead, 207; and mercury, 200.

Remarkable Hailstones are described and figured by Mr. Thomas Sutton in the Proceedings of the Royal Society. The district over which the hail fell on July 13, 1862, was strikingly small, being only a few furlongs. The fall was preceded by a violent storm. The hailstones did not fall in a continuous succession, but appeared to descend in groups, separated by thickly strewn with them, whilst an adjoining one escaped with hardly any, one part of the same meadow being completely covered, and another completely exposed, except uninjured. So great was the force that in some cases the hailstones were cut in the grass, and the ears of corn were completely severed. The end of a prehistoric branch of beech, 12in. long and 2in. in circumference, was found cut off by the hail, and two branches from apple trees were broken. The hailstones were of different forms and sizes, and Mr. Sutton sketched no less than forty varieties of shape and size. The largest of those preserved by Mr. Sutton was 8oz., but some weighed by other persons were said to be nearly a pound. One cake-shaped hailstone had a related mass resembling a mushroom rising out of it. Another was a perfect sphere, with a flat piece of ice, quite clear, and in size like nutmegs.

Resolution of a letter of reference to the communication of M. Person on this subject to the Academy of Sciences (noticed in our Number for the 13th of December, page 594), Mr. Graham has written to the Academy stating that ammoniacal gas (Schlösser's liquor) is not only a solvent of cotton and cellulose, but also of silk; but, while it requires only a short immersion to dissolve the cotton, it requires a month or more to twelve—to dissolve silk, according to the quantity and proportion of the liquor employed. It is also more than three days to dissolve silk with the ammoniate of copper without its undergoing the least modification in its texture and appearance. Mr. Graham has succeeded in producing from it an operation a triple fibre of cotton, silk, and wool. The solution of silk, in ammoniacal gas, is perfectly clear and transparent.

The Phenomena of Attraction and Adhesion, as exhibited in solid bodies, films, liquid globules, &c., have been investigated by M. Plateau at Ghent, and the results of his researches in the form of a paper in the Royal Society, from which we extract a few experiments. There Mr. Norris produces by reminding a floating body, as a piece of cork, to which two needles floating on liquids modify the figure of the surface of the liquid; pieces of cotton or paper, when they are moistened, are attracted to the sides of the circle it, giving rise to small mounds of liquid bounded by concave line; the attracted lines, as M. Plateau states them, are hyperbolas. These experiments are arranged to show that these effects of attraction are not a collar to the sides of the vessel containing the liquid; that the liquid must be associated with the bodies in which the movement occurs. 1. Let two balls of resinous wax, or other substance which is not wetted by water, be floated on water by sides in such a manner that they will both be partially immersed in the liquid. If they are then brought near together, they will, as a matter of fact, and the suspended balls consequently parallel. When brought within the proper range they will be suddenly attracted towards each other by capillary pulses. In doing so they necessarily describe a small arc of a circle, of which the centre is the point of suspension. 2. Let a small drop of water be made to provide each other in a horizontal line, but have been raised to a higher level. 3. Suspend mentally, by means of a horizontal thread, a drop of water, and, adhering weight, a horizontal cork disc, from the under surface of which a drop of water is suspended. Experiments with globules of liquid, floating in water, place a small piece of paper or thin glass, on the surface of which there is a drop of water, and the experiment will succeed. The drop of water will not touch each other the paper or plate will be instantly drawn up to it; or, if the drop of water be placed on the under side of the glass, it will not touch it, but remain suspended from it. When a bubble is allowed to fall on an irregular surface, such as a piece of fire or thread, it will be attracted towards it. If it be placed on a surface, such as a sheet of glass, be brought into slight contact with it, the pull of the bubble will be sufficient to overcome the force that flattened and held it in contact, when two bubbles come in contact by their convex surfaces and others, the adhering surfaces become flattened, and the bubbles in a group cohere by plain surfaces.

ROYAL INSTITUTION CHRISTMAS LECTURES.

Professor Frankland began a course of six lectures "On the Properties of Air and Water" on Saturday last. He commenced by a general and detailed description of the atmosphere as shown by a diagram, on which were represented the highest mountains of the globe, and the highest balloon ascents, with their accurate—viz., about 5½ miles, by Mr. Glaisher, in his late scientific balloon ascent. The lecturer then described the various air bar-weather, and explained that air is a certain hollow sphere weighed about 200 grains, and stated that the density of the air at the highest mountain known to him. The pressure and no exercise of the atmosphere were shown by a number of interesting and convincing experiments by the aid of the air-pump, exhausting syringe, &c. The principle on which barometers are constructed, and their important use in forecasting the weather, and the varying pressure of the atmosphere, were duly considered. A small steam engine was put in motion by the force exerted by compressed air when the pressure was removed; and, by means of a model tube, the method by which the Pneumatic Despatch Company propose to convey packets was shown. The blue colour of the atmosphere the Professor attributed to the interference of the other rays of the spectrum. To illustrate this the electric light was employed to produce a beautiful spectrum, and exhibit, among other phenomena, the complementary colours, mountain peaks illuminated by the setting sun, the lunal sun in a dense fog, &c.

CANADIAN STEAMER RUNNING LACHINE RAPID OF THE ST. LAWRENCE.

LACHINE RAPID OF THE RIVER ST. LAWRENCE.

OF the many remarkable phenomena peculiar to the physical characteristics of North America few are more interesting than the particular features of the great rivers called rapids. The geological formations of a great portion of that continent consist of immense masses of horizontal strata, in the great depressions of which lie the great lakes. The outfall from these lakes and the rivers which connect them together, and the upper part of the Great St. Lawrence, which is their common outfall, run over these horizontal beds, often very little below the level of the surrounding country, and seldom down the bottom of great natural valleys, as do the principal rivers of Europe. In the course of time these falling waters have worn channels for themselves more or less deep. Where the level between the upper and lower horizontal strata is considerable, and especially where the lower strata is softer than that which caps it, a cataract is produced, as at Niagara, and a deep groove cut through which the escaped waters find their way to another outlet; but should the rock over which the descending waters pass have but a gradual fall, and be of hard material, the water simply cuts a shallow channel, and the river is quiet and navigable, as are many portions of the St. Lawrence; yet the river is not navigable both ways from end to end; for although the fall of the river may be considerable, yet, if it be gradual, no cataract is produced, but a rapid exists instead—that is, the descending water of the river, instead of tumbling over a precipice, rushes through an inclined trough down which vessels may pass in safety, but can never ascend by the same route if the rapid be really worthy of its name; for a real rapid is a very different thing to a strong current.

Many of these rapids are met with in the course of the River St.

THE CANADIAN LUMBER TRADE: CLEARING A JAM—FROM A SKETCH BY G. H. ANDREWS.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

Lawrence, between the cities of Montreal and Kingston. One of them is over twelve miles in length, and is throughout its course a rush of broken water heaving and surging like the sea in a tempest. The rapid is split into two channels, a long inland dividing them. Both passages are now used by steamers, but for many years the south one was considered navigable. But the great rapid of the St. Lawrence—that is, the one most difficult to navigate and the most terrible, by the sudden and irregular pitch of its waters—is that farthest down the stream, called the Lachine Rapids, being situated near the village of that name, and also the Indian village of Caughnawaga. This is the one which appears in our Illustration. The Highness Prince of Wales ran this rapid at sunset on the 29th of September, 1860, in the steamer Kingston.

To enable the vessels which descend the river by running the rapids to make their way up stream again, it has been necessary to construct a series of canals, parallel to the rapids, which the Illustration exhibits. These canals are very fine works, and are in very creditable to the energy and skill of the colonists.

Running a rapid is at all times an exciting circumstance, whether it be done in a birch-bark canoe on a small river, or in a steamer on the St. Lawrence. But the vessel approaches the rapid at a point which, to experienced eyes, and especially chosen for the purpose—take charge of the wheel: extra hands stand by to assist; while several others are at the tiller. In this manner the ship by its means should the wheel-tackle give way. The captain takes his place by the wheelhouse, ready with his bell to communicate with the engineer. The vessel is carried on at a high speed, and falls, rolls from side to side, and labours as in a heavy sea; but the engine is equal to the vessel's onward forward with frightful rapidity. Sometimes she appears to be rushing headlong on to some frightful rock that shows its black head above the waters, as if to the breakers in the midst of the rapids, and then be shot by it, and is making a contrary course; and so instant she has shot by it, and is making a contrary course; and so instant she threads her way through the crooked channel that would seem impossible for her to steer. A few minutes generally suffice for this, and the smooth green water is reached again; then all breathe freely; for none but old hands, or the Indian pilot, ever run the great rapid of Lachine with bated breath.

THE DESTRUCTION BY FIRE OF ROSSIN HOUSE HOTEL, TORONTO.

THE totally pile of buildings in Toronto known as the Rossin House Hotel was, as our readers have been informed, burnt down on the 14th of February last. Through the courtesy of Mr. Edward Hooper, of Toronto, we are enabled to give in our present Number a View of the ruins of the hotel, as viewed from the south-east, on the morning after the fire.

Rossin House is stated to have been the first hotel in Canada; indeed, in the States or elsewhere it had few rivals in extent or accommodation. It was erected by public subscription, raised chiefly through the instrumentality of the enterprising brothers, Messrs. Marcus and Samuel Rossin, and designed to supply a want that had long been felt in Toronto. "It was (says the Toronto Leader) originally built in connection with the Northern Railway, under the superintendence of Mr. William Kaufman, architect, of Toronto. It fronted on King and York streets—on the former street it had a recorded frontage of 130ft., and on the latter 102ft.; and presented a facade of 335ft. long and five stories in height. In depth it was about 100ft., on Simcoe-street, and 150ft. on York-street. From the centre of the King-street frontage, near the centre, a wing extended almost to a line with the York-street flank. This wing contained the main dining-room, a handsome room, 60ft. long by 40ft. wide in breadth. Underneath the dining-room, and also in a low wing extending easterly from it, were the kitchen and offices. The building was originally constructed of brick, the fronts being of white pressed brick, with stone dressings. The main entrance was in York-street, which opened into a recessed portico, in which the large and spacious hall paved with tiles. A wide staircase led from this hall to the second floor. From the second floor, about the centre of the building, another flight of stairs led to the top of the building communicating with each floor. In addition to this there was a stairway at the east end in King-street. The second floor was fitted up as a ball-room, similar at the south end of the York-street front. In all there were 202 rooms in the hotel, the principal portion of which were lighted with gas, and finished in May, 1857." The pile of buildings comprised besides the hotel fifteen stores, which were situated in the ground floor, and which at the time of the fire were all tenanted.

At about two o'clock on the morning of the 14th of November last a fire broke out in the kitchen of the hotel. An alarm was instantly raised, but, notwithstanding the great efforts made to extinguish the flames, in half-an-hour nothing but a mass of ruins remained of the hotel. The whole of the shops were also destroyed. There were at the time of the fire about two hundred visitors at Rossin House, all of whom escaped with but little clothing, owing to the admirable manner in which the house was arranged. Every corridor was wide, straight, and well lighted, and communicated with the stairs at each end by staircases. The calamity was not, however, unattended with loss of life. Mr. W. Graham, the son of a Toronto merchant, was burnt to death. The drowning of a room in which a number of porters were engaged in removing some furniture gave way, and they were carried down with the falling and burning timbers, and four or more of them perished. Governor Graham were rescued. At the funeral of Mr. Graham, which took place on the following day, a large number assembled to pay a last tribute of respect to the memory of the deceased.

A public meeting has been held at Toronto to express sympathy with the Messrs. Rossin on their severe misfortune, and to consider the best means to be taken to rebuild the hotel.

THE LUMBER TRADE IN OUR NORTH AMERICAN PROVINCES.

LUMBER everywhere in North America means timber; sometimes it is specially applied to manufactured timber—that is, to timber sawn into scantlings, battens, and other reduced scantlings, but it is always a generic term for every description of timber that is not wrought into any article of use or ornament.

The lumber trade is the most adventurous, the most romantic, and the most speculative of all the commercial enterprises can only possess a secondary position in the minds of those who dwell in it. The youngest and best men are sure to embark first in the trade of the forest and marsh; it suits them better than the dull, quiet, monotonous life on the farm, where the occupations change only with the seasons; they like the wild, half-Indian life in the woods and on the rivers, that brings forth all their resources, mental and physical, and the practical self-reliance that is developed in every true backwoodsman. Moreover, they enjoy their unbounded freedom, and like the excitement of wandering into previously-untrodden countries; but above all they like the speculative character of their calling. They always consider that the chief gains in a short time (and often do); their risks and hardships are great, but after the first year or two are nothing to the monotonous long-drawn days of delight. The timber safely got out, the ponderous raft sweeps down the rapids of the tawny Ottawa or blue St. Lawrence, guided by seven or eight men, who are generally all the crew. They feel they know that in a few weeks all will be safely moored at Quebec, and then they have dollars to draw by bagfull—account-money I know all paid at once—the lumberman steps from his raft to the shore with the same feelings which Jack walks out of the ship; and both instantly commence a course of proceedings which, in a somewhat less or a considerable men would adopt. They fancy they enjoy themselves, and perhaps they do; lumbermen, like sailors, generally come out of these runs "ashore" utterly penniless and unable to account for a single dollar of their hardearned cash; but, then, they have had their fling, so quickly are up stream again to the hills and the mills for the rest of the summer, and returning winter finds them again buried in the wilderness.

The lumber business of Canada and New Brunswick is carried on on an immense scale, very large amounts of capital being invested in the different establishments—many hundreds of men at times being employed by a single individual. The most extensive are those on the Ottawa and its tributaries, the St. Francis, the Saguny, and other great rivers in Canada, and the St. John and other rivers falling either into the Gulf of St. Lawrence or the Bay of Fundy.

For the purpose of more clearly explaining the details of this peculiar and interesting business we will endeavour to trace out the progress of a stick of timber from the spot where it grew in the wilderness until it is either converted into manufactured lumber at boards, or delivered on board the ships for exportation.

The locality that is generally chosen, a few hands are sent forward at low-water time, in a canoe, to cut the beaver-grass—that is, the wild grass that grows on the beaver meadows—which the beaver has already made it into hay, it is stacked at once to be ready for fodder. The hands are then employed in cutting down the trees, and where-ing the cattle which are necessary to haul the timber to the river-bank, and in making roads and burried all succulent vegetation.

It is not until the actual arrival of winter that the lumbermen move into the forests in any numbers; but all is bustle and excitement then. They go in gangs of fifteen to fifty men, according to the size of the establishments pending, of course, on their various proportions.

The trees are felled by during the months of frost and snow, many hundreds of miles from other human habitation, entirely cut off by frost and snow from all communication with the world; yet they enjoy a good health and are as happy as any of the subjects of her Majesty elsewhere. The food consumed by the gangs is found by their employers: it consists of salt pork, beef, flour, beans, peas, potatoes, turnips, and tea; or, as the lawyers say, all or any of them.

It will be gratifying to the sentimental reader to learn that the lumberjacks are not children of the wilderness, whose lives are amphibiously passed either in the woods or in the watercourses, to know that with the strongest temptations to do so the lumberjacks rarely, very rarely ardent spirits are forbidden to be introduced; tea is the great standing drink, taken as strong as it can be made, and is called "tea and molasses." The latter process rather than the former; theirs is not a delicate stomach. Some of the men will pork, beef, flour, beans, peas, in the mouth, or in their own language, "put a buffalo's tongue," or "float an axe."

White pine, which is the timber most sought, for cutting into deals and shipping to Europe, grows in groves upon undulating land, and the lumberjacks, who are by no means fools, know exactly where it grows entirely unmixed in extensive level plains.

It is positively necessary that the locality selected for cutting the timber should be intersected by a watercourse of greater or less dimensions, as it is by it that the only means exist of getting out the timber. To this end, and to avoid unnecessary labour in making a road, by cutting down the timber in the line of it and clearing away obstructions; branch roads, as they are called, are made, which by the most elementary measures are complete the work of cutting the trees commences.

It takes about a three-quarters of an hour to cut down a large tree; a gang of three or four cut about nine trees a day.

The axe used to fell the trees is of peculiar shape, and of the finest temper. English axes have never been liked in America; those who use them complain that the manufacturers here will not carry out the proper principles of tempering. The American axe, however, is rarely ever met with.

The skill acquired by the lumbermen in the use of the axe is extraordinary. A tree is cut at a particular spot, which varies with the height of the man who cuts it, these being one particular point at which a certain blow will tell with the greatest effect. Some will say other. The blows of the axe are repeated with great rapidity and unerring skill, and the tree falls in its course. The men then vious use. The plan of this work is excellent. The history and details of the structure are given separately from the history of the see and the notices of the principal bishops; so that the work serves the double purpose of a handy guide on the spot and a valuable and complete book of reference. It was scarcely to be expected that the author should undertake to clear away Ferguson's views on many restorations and additions to our cathedrals; and we are not surprised that he has swept the whole of pointing, not only for reformation which might with some show of reason and legitimacy seek to imitate what they replaced, but also for additions in which there is such undiscussed room to dissent. Severe censure is nowadays passed upon many things done in the declining ages of architecture, and yet we are ourselves perpetrating by wholesale, and with equal impunity. The account of Oxford Cathedral, which, although the smallest in England, has many points of architectural interest, is very complete and interesting. The demolitions in the cloister, and alterations made by Wolsey in the Norman nave and choir (which is attributed to the time when Cardinal Pole was at St. Frideswide's, 1150-1180), are carefully described. The proper dates are assigned to some of the interesting monuments in the Lady Chapel. The west front of Peterborough Cathedral, with its unique triple Early English, receives that minute attention which its graceful details and varied beauty deserve. Mr. Kingsley Mr. Ferguson's opinion that, "as a portico, using the term in its classical sense, the west front of Peterborough is the grandest and finest in Europe," though wanting in the correspondences which would enable it to rival some of the great facades of Continental cathedrals." The ceiling of the nave, designed by Wyatt, is condemned as "very remarkable; as, with the exception of the one at St. Albans, the only example of the originality of a modern architect." Where is abundant evidence on the Continent to show, were the usual covering of an early Norman nave; but still more so as a misleading and incongruous feature. Lincoln is one of the actual colours of its painted decoration, and on this account, therefore, may be absolutely unique. Beneath a blue stone, bearing the simple inscription, "Gautier Cathedra . . . 1536," daily touched by the needless visitors, in the north choir-aisle, still rest the remains of Catherine of Aragon, the unfortunate wife whose hard fate and whose the preservation of this fine abbey and its conversion into a cathedral church. The great open arches of the triforium, which at once attract attention in Gloucester Cathedral, are scarcely less so in this than the arches of the nave beneath them, occur in no other English cathedral. The chapter-house, one of the finest pieces of early work on the Continent. The misereres below the stalls here have some curious grotesque carvings. The new chapter-house, a very interesting modern erection, or altarpiece, of the Jesus Chapel, a polytptch in tempera, executed about the end of the fourteenth century, are not unnoticed by our English author. At Ely Cathedral, containing examples of the different periods of Gothic architecture, from Early Norman to Perpendicular, with all the highest possible value and interest for the student of architecture especially as the chronicles of the abbey have recorded the exact date of nearly every portion of the building. In both of these details and numerous interesting monuments are therefore treated with correspondingly ample fullness. The largest Gothic church (i.e., not only in England, but in Europe; although some (as, for example, Milan Cathedral) cover much more ground. The great feature is, of course, the octagon, built on the site of the old central tower, and to replace the original Norman tower, and, "perhaps the most beautiful and original thing of the kind in the Gothic architecture of England." There is nothing certainly more striking than the view across the octagon of Ely from the angle of the nave-aisles. The painted ceilings here, partly restored of Mr. C. Winston, acquire a fresh though melancholy interest from the recent death of that gentleman.

Lincoln Cathedral is the largest of our English churches and its commanding situation on its "sovereign hill," is, for the greater part, of Early English date; and although Salisbury and Westminster are in some respects grander and more elaborate examples, it is an especial interest from the fact of its having been commenced long before either. The nave is of wider proportions than Salisbury, and retains its original stained glass, and is "one of the most splendid, and, in its present state, one of the most perfect works of the thirteenth century" and the most splendid example of the Early English stained glass in England." The sculptured figures of angels which fill the spandrels of the arches also rank among the very best examples of Early English art. We may say, in conclusion, that the care and judgment displayed in the former parts are well sustained in the present.

The works on travel of Fredrika Bremer have always been accepted with favour, inasmuch as they have about them most of the characteristics of style and description which marked her tales of home-life in Sweden—a power of observation, and reproduction of scenes, the results of observation, essential to the manipulation of good books; descriptive of travel abroad, could not be wanting in one who has shown so fully the possession of such qualities in dealing with the features, natural and domestic, of her own country. The taking of notes in the course of a journey which, if one is to judge by that which pervades the books which tell of them, were in every sense pleasure-tour, and produces them here, in Miss Bremer's case, has therefore no fruitful in success with the public that it was to be expected that the course would be run a little longer and a little further; and we have now to add to the list of books entitled after the manner of Hurst and Blackett, which appears with singular appositeness at the present moment, when Greece were to have Her Majesty, there is little doubt but that a Prince of that royal family will be selected which the people of this country regard as something which it is their peculiar privilege to guard and cherish, and to placed on the throne from which Otho has been ejected so easily. At such a time, when so much about Greek volumes would have a singular value in this country just now, when moments they bring before us Greece as a country, and its inhabitants as a people, during a fruitful kind of transition which promises to be not something like a moving panorama. As Miss Bremer describes, we feel as if we were looking out of one of those brown pictures of canvas on which is represented a series of views passing slowly before us, and which are generally so manipulated as to be as near life and reality as possible. The time when the book opens places Constantinople, on the evening of the 9th of August, 1859, until her return to Stockholm, on the 8th of June, 1862, after travels, in the main, five years, her descriptive journal glides smoothly along, teemed with graphic sketches of places, men, and things; and if you do not receive minute accounts, and are not included in high philosophic writing, you are conscious of a great deal of interesting matter and a very agreeable narrative. As the present volume of Miss Bremer's is due to Mrs Howitt, whose translation has caught the spirit of the original; and yet no English reader would suppose that he was perusing a foreign work. The great charm of the first volume is filled with descriptions of Athens and Athenian life and manners; and one chapter treats not only of the Acropolis and its ruins, and Athens personally, but speaks of a visit by Prince Alfred to Athens in November, 1859. Of him the narrative thus speaks:—

At length—after a cloudy and gusty wind—the promise of rain. England's young Prince Alfred makes, in the meantime, sunshine at Athens. Yesterday a royal ball was given for him at the Palace. About 1,000 were the guests, in consequence of an invitation from her Majesty. I had already seen the young Prince at his levée in the morning, and at the Royal ball at Athens; and at eight in the evening I accordingly went to the Palace.

The Prince had arrived at Athens in full-dress uniform, and looked still the same charming characteristic, the unpretending boy united to the gentleman in bearing and fine tact. It was therefore to me the greatest simplicity of uniform, and without the slightest distinguishing ornament, feeling in this respect always more sympathetic to the habits of dress of Greece. Resplendent with jewels and good humour, a real Semiramis, a queen of superb appearance, all eyes. This evening, however, perhaps the greater number were captivated by the resplendent son of Queen Victoria.

In consideration of the remainder of the work will show how thoroughly Greece, as the kingdom is now constituted, has been done by the authoress, and how happily and neatly she conveys her impressions for her readers, who, for ordinary and special reasons in this particular instance, will, we should imagine, be numerous.

We have before us another work which is also peculiarly suited to the moment. It is written by Mr. D. W. Mitchell, an Englishman who has been a resident in Richmond, Virginia, and is entitled Ten Years in the United States. Being an Englishman's View of Men and Things in the North and South. Smith and Elder.) In author states his object to be to explain, if possible, the most active and powerful causes of the great revolution which has taken place in the country in which he lived, working for his livelihood, and, at the same time, observing human nature as developed in Americans and American politics. The residence of Mr. Mitchell in the States commenced in 1848, that year of European convulsions; and he starts with confidence that he has better opportunity than common observing and understanding the people of whom he has written, their habits and feelings, their private and public life, and believes himself to make a positive gain to the causes of the split between North and South, not the less because he, with some few others, had marked their rise and progress, and reflected upon the tendency of the life, political and social, of the United States. The author opens with a clear understanding and explaining the facts which he has here collected, he had to abandon many cherished opinions and prejudices, as he has formed before he went to the States; and he admits that it is more than probable that some of the statements he has put forth will conflict with the small light on the subject which now prevails. He has, however, protested that he has written carefully and conscientiously, with a desire to arrive at the truth, and that he has not written or published anything now going on, sinking for the time sectarian and party prepossessions. The conclusion to which he arrives is that the separation of the North and South, or local confederacy, is inevitable. Mr. Mitchell therefore inevitably follows, as a matter of course, he does not hesitate to add, in absolute slavery and social progression and retrogression, very much a change. There will probably be those who, in learning these pecuniary confessions of a writer on the vexed question, who has been a resident in the Southern States, will not be able to conclude that he is a writer in the Confederate interest purely. Well, perhaps he is so, but with the most unaffected confidence and sincerity; and if his work is taken up with just so much qualification as is implied in these two circumstances of avowal of opinion on the broad question, and of local residence, we think that the reader will be found to have dealt with the case as nearly fairly and impartially as possible. The modern style of description, to which this volume contains, there is a good deal of characteristic local colouring. The plan of the book is founded on the notion of endeavouring, as far as possible, to let the facts speak for themselves, to avoid generalizations, and to let the parties and factions state their own views; and we have accordingly found the most effective passages to be those in stated and quotations may be taken to be the deliberate opinions of enlightened Americans, expressed in conversations and discussions at various times, which opportunities of which the author has not forgotten. It should be observed that the work contains sketches of life and manners, and of the principal men of the North and South, and at New York mainly, and some chapters are devoted to somewhat remote—for America—history, from which deductions are drawn and applied to the modern state of the country. Throughout, even if I had no other merit, the earlier chapters, which do something for mainer the author's views, are interesting, and, as the author himself and their ways, would make this book acceptable; but we venture to think that, as a whole, it is a contribution of some value to the knowledge of the United States, and deserves to be read at so early a period to come across at this particular juncture.

Messrs. Simpkin and Marshall have recently published One Hundred Sonnets on the Ancient and Modern Dramatic Poets, the Heathen Mythology, Oratory, and Literature, by Mr. D. C. Jones. The author is a modern disciple of Shakspeare, and a true admirer of the dramatic art, in the sixth century before Christ, down to the nineteenth, and to the very present. It should, however, be stated, that as the title of the book is rather an inadequate one for the work for the volume before us contains only nine lectures, and those confined to the consideration of Shakspeare's plays. It is to be regretted, too, that the author states that he is in a position to carry out his programme, as he is in possession of material sufficient on which to write for the next two or three years. The publication of any considerable portion of the result of his labours depends on the favour of the public. That favour, it is to be hoped, will be forthcoming, as the work is somewhat limited, because we fear that Greek tragedy does not, in the present day, possess the power with sufficient attention to the general mass of even well-educated people while the scholar knows that the study of such disquisition as is here entered into is not felt; but to those who do not possess the requisite knowledge of the Greek drama of the Greeks, desire to know what the plays which Æschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, and Aristophanes wrote more than two thousand years ago, we can fairly recommend the perusal of these lectures. The author has done for the Greek plays something like that which was done for Shakspeare by Charles Lamb and his sister Mary, when they wrote poems of the dramatic bard in plain prose narrative. We do not mean to be understood that Mr. Jones has proved a failure, but fallen so decidedly into the error of producing Sophocles made easy to the meanest understanding as happened in the instance of the Shakspeare tales. Mr. Jones is a thorough Greek linguist to a person who has no knowledge of the Greek language to understand and appreciate the force and true dramatic power of whose renown they have so much, and the study of which forms still a portion of considerable number of the students in schools and universities all over the world.

The North Atlantic Sea-bird, by Dr. G. C. Wallich, is, without doubt, the most important work which interesting contributions to our knowledge of the natural history of the ocean-bird which has appeared since the publication of Captain Maury's volume on a nearly similar subject some years ago. The "North Atlantic Sea-bird" (we should only stated to be a first part) comprises the whole of the diary kept by Dr. Wallich during the cruise of the Bulldog in the summer of 1860, under the Government in 1860, under the command of Sir F. L. M'Clintock, to survey the proposed North Atlantic telegraph route between Valentia and Newfoundland. The Bulldog was fully fitted for the service and life at depths where the pressure of the sea must be most enormous; indeed, under conditions which it has often been said no organized beings could exist, and where the bottom of the sea was considered could exist, under the known and supposed extraordinary pressure, nutrition, locomotion, and even sight. The Bulldog, which has most frequent and widely-distributed organisms of the ocean. They count in all nine species, and the most curious of these is one genus, namely, the Globigerina—which may be regarded as essentially oceanic, since it is to be found in all latitudes and at all depths, varying from 50 to 2,000 fathoms, and which, in consequence, appears to be the deeper areas of the seabed. There, like the sands of the shore, it shows layers of many miles in depth, and is found distributed all by vast strata. The great superficial current of the Atlantic does not bear it away in countless multitudes from tropical coast-lines, nor does the Gulf-stream bear it northward to Europe. Nevertheless, it is evident that there is an intimate association between the Globigerina and the Gulf-stream, for wherever the latter flows the one sweeping across the surface of the ocean we are sure to detect the other acting on the seabed. Thus between the Faroe Islands and Iceland, where the Gulf-stream and Greenland current intermingle, portion of the direct route between Cape Farewell and Rockall, Globigerina is the prevailing form in the bottom deposit. Between Greenland and Labrador, along the belt traversed by the Arctic current, and in northerly direction along the coast of Labrador, it is either absent or occurs only in very limited quantities. Where the Gulf-stream conditions are favourable to its increase in one case and unfavourable in the other. Dr. Wallich has also found that the Globigerina is a highly-organized sudatic animals at extreme depths may justly be regarded as the knowledge of any era in marine zoology; for, if we attentively examine their bearings, we shall find that, whilst they throw a flood of light on the conditions essential to the maintenance of life in existing seas, they serve at the same time to explain anomalies in the history of some of the older fossiliferous strata, and thus add another link to the chain that binds the present with the past. Dr. Wallich also points out another very interesting circumstance that animals can, although plants cannot, exist without light; for it is an ascertained fact that at certain depths the light of day ceases to penetrate; it is, indeed, if not quite, almost total darkness. The temperature at great depths exerts the share of influence over vegetable life. "When, however," writes Dr. Wallich, "we estimate its effects on the distribution of animals and plants in the ocean we find them to be extremely unequal; for whereas marine organisms are found at a depth of at least 15,000ft., no vegetable structures have been met with in a living state lower than 2400ft. No example of the Algæ proper have been met with below 2000 fathoms, and that the only recognisable vegetable structures which occur amongst the deep-sea deposits belong to the lowest order with which we are acquainted—namely, the Diatomaceæ."

The English Spartacus in the Western Prairies (Hurst and Blackett) is a good specimen of the peculiar Berkeley descriptive powers. Whether we examine the annals of the Oakley Hunt, or into the question of the Independents of the New Forest or Christ Church Bay, there will be but one response—that he is a mighty Nimrod, a rare shot, and a right learned naturalist as well. He has thrown a small light on the habits of many bird or animal which we or ours have—from the red deer to the jenny wren; and hence it is no wonder that, after hunting and shooting over all parts of the globe, he should have wished to stand face to face with the monarch of the Western prairies. Accordingly, in the August of 1859, he set forth with his dear friend Bayford, a gentleman, and a fine sportsman, and their attendant, George Bronfield, in the capacity of correspondent to the Field newspaper. The journey to have been pretty rough, as the dogs as well as the ship's cow were sick. The habits of the bob-boys and the rowdies, the universal spitting, and some allusions to the general coarseness of the Yankees and Canadians, who differ with our author on the subject of the game laws and the suffrage), rather lead us, after landing from the general purpose of the book; but in due season we get our author fairly in the plains. "Chance" begins his American circuit by pointing a golden-headed meadow-lark, and the first thing that comes to the bag is a prairie-hen, and then a wild pigeon. St. Louis had nearly proved a turning-back point; but a good friend, the chief of the Fur Hudson Bay's fams and a first-class fascination, stepped in promptly with a loan, and thus enabled him to achieve his grand mission of slaying the wild bison. No one, as he was told, had ever killed more than one in one run, and that was when the back of one horse, and hence this was the wicket which this very Jackson of hunters had to beat. He was told that no horse-flesh would carry fourteen stone up to a bison at full speed was no easy matter; but he achieved it in the case of two, for which he gave about £45 apiece, and if he was astonished at the low remuneration of the Indian horsetones smoking a long clay pipe, he was still more so when he heard a bit of English spoken by the owners of the horses appearing to others without stopping for one moment to consider whether or no they had a permission. With his three brace of mules and his four horses and ponies, and a cart, in his charge, our author starts on his grand commission we hear rather too much; as his professed guide, he sat forth with the large of a waggon-load of provisions. The first day's sport he begun rather ingeniously by pointing a land turtle; but although a rattlesnake was killed, fur was loosed and Taymouth was saddled for the chance of a bison-bull. At this we are glad to say he puts to the rest fun, which with his friend Bayard to help him, began in earnest only on the 5th of September, when the long-wished-for sight of at least thirty bull bisons feeding burst upon him at last. How they crooked their tails, from the patriarch bull down to the youngest bull-calf, and charged, and how Bronfield killed them, as he said, how they bit the dust, and hat their tongues cut out as a trophy; and how the hunger of the party was appeased, we refer to Mr. Berkeley's best style and illustrated by some spirited drawings from his hand. The story of his travels was first told by him in the St. Joseph's Institute, at Brighton, in the four days, the course of his talks, chained one to each corner of the platform; and he has now published the whole of his travels in the form recorded above.

Aphorisms of the Wise and Good is the title of a tastefully bound and illuminated little book published by Messrs. Griffith and Farren. The text consists of a collection of sayings, or, as the compiler so aphorisms, maxims, observations, and moral axioms from Bacon, Shakspeare, Milton, Addison, Pope, Johnson, &c. &c. We are always the case in such collections—are mere truisms; but most of them are gems of thought, sparkling with fancy, flashing with wit, or gleaming with profound wisdom. The compiler, Mr. Thomas Stanesby, are more chaste and elegant than those of many publications of far higher pretensions. It is just the book to match up for a moment from the drawing-room table.

Miss M. Bethum Edwards is the authoress of a book of tales in verse for children, with illustrations by Mr. H. R. Robertson, entitled Snow-Flakes, and the Stories they told the Children, and published by Messrs. Sampson Low and Co. We have much pleasure in recommending as one of the very best children's books of the season. The five stories told by the fairy snowflakes are really admirable for their simple charm, their pathos, their genuine humour, their moral and womanly sentiment, and the lessons they teach the little folks of love and gentleness.

AMERICAN MAPS.

Series of American Maps, published by Bacon and Co., Peternoster-row, 1862.—1. "Army Map of the Seat of War in Virginia, showing the Battle-fields, Fortifications, &c., on an east once the Potomac River."—This map is on a large scale, and includes the physical features and military positions between the Shenandoah River on the west and Eastern Maryland on the east. Northward it extends as far as the Pennsylvania boundary, the recent forty into Maryland, and southward as far as the Rapidan and Fredericksburg. Within these limits the various battle-fields are marked in the minutest case, and at the same time locality, of its topographical details. It is brought down to the close of the year 1862, and includes the whole General Kearney was killed. The successive chains of mountains, the rivers, railroads, and common roads are all laid down. 2. "Topographical Map of the Maps of Eastern Virginia which we have seen we prefer this for reference. 3. "Bacon's Map of the Seat of War in Virginia and the Adjacent States."—It includes a portion of Southern Pennsylvania, all Maryland, Delaware, all Eastern and Middle Virginia, and Western States as the mountains of Kentucky of North Carolina. A pink flush under the names of notorious places makes easily seen the country which is the seat of war. 4. "Bacon's Military Map of America."—This map is a handy map of the United States, British America, and the adjacent parts of Mexico. It covers a large space on a screen. Although entitled "military" by virtue of its showing the forts and fortifications, it is a map for all purposes. 5. "Bacon's Map of America."—All parts of States and territories are coloured yellow, interposed between the Pre-laboured Republic of the United States and the adjacent parts of Mexico in pink.—6. "Bacon's Steel-plate Map of the American States, showing the railroads, canals, &c."—This map includes the United States, from the Atlantic of the Mississippi. It includes the greater part of Canada, and retains the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

American Maps, published by W. and A. K. Johnston, Edinburgh, 1862.—1. "Map of the Battle-fields of America, including portions of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania."—This map is constructed under Richard, James River. A blue line under the names of noted places aids the eye. Appended to the map is a table of the forces of the United States, British America, and part of Mexico. The Free-labour, Border, and Secession States are distinguished by colour in the map. 2. "Johnston's Map of the United States."—This map is a converse of the previous one. It consists of the United States, from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, 100 miles west of the Mississippi; the smaller section map is a local map of the seat of war in Eastern Virginia. Railroads and military roads abounding in the North to below Richmond and Norfolk on the South. The maps of this series are made to a uniform scale, and the Free and Slave States are shown elsewhere.

Colton's Series of Maps. Gan and Co., Craven-street.—"2806 Miles Around Washington."—At the distance of each 100 miles from the centre a circle is drawn to enable the inquirer to measure the distance at which he resides from the capital. 2. "Colton's Map by Land and Water."—This map is a handy one for the purpose. The population of the United States, as they were according to the three last censuses, is given in the margin. 3. "Colton's Railroad Chart, showing the Seat of War in the West."—The same division by circles is adopted in this map. The maps of this series give every county and county town in clear type.

THE HOUSE OF PEERS.—We find from "Who's Who in 1863" that the House of Peers consists of one Prince, two Royal Dukes, three Archbishops, 25 Dukes, 20 Marquises, 101 Earls, 22 Viscounts, 27 Bishops, and 179 Barons, making a total of 476 members, as the present Bishop of Bath and Wells sits in the House also as Baron Auckland. In addition, there are 19 Peers who are minors, and await their coming of age to take their seats in the house. The Peers of Scotland and Ireland, who are not Peers of Parliament, number 114, of whom five are minors. There are 14 Peeresses in their own right. The members of the Privy Council in England and Ireland are 220. There are 893 Baronets, 479 Civil or Military Knights, and 1112 Noblesse and Baronets, who are also Knights of the various Orders of Knighthood. There are 710 Companions of the Bath, 1 Field Marshal, 1 Admiral of the Fleet, 36 Generals in the Army, 596 Generals, 360 Generals in the Indian Army, 1,000 Admirals, and 157 Queen's Counsel and Serjeants-at-law.

"THE MUSIC-LESSON," PAINTED BY MARIANI.

In the remarks on the picture of "Mary Queen of Scots being Led to Execution" we give our motives for offering the reader Engravings from that and also the present picture. The two works indicate some of the best characteristics and tendencies of the rapidly-rising art of Italy. Instead of continuing to waste thought and invention on the hackneyed themes of classical mythology and saint-lingoed, and losing all power and all aim at originality, in the vain effort to rival the old masters by servilely imitating their styles and borrowing their subjects, the younger painters of Italy have of late years gone—and with the happiest effect—to nature and authentic history. Signor Vanmitelli's picture illustrates the kind of subject now chosen from the world's annals, instead of apochryphal stories of saints and impossible representations of Olympian divinities; and "The Music-lesson," by Signor Mariani, of Rome, shows us that modest genre—the unaffected representation of the simple incidents of ordinary life—has found means of springing up in the apparently unfavourable atmosphere of the Eternal City and under the shade of the Vatican and the Sistine Chapel. Artists everywhere begin to find that a subject simple as the present demands, if less learning, research, and invention, perhaps nicer observation of nature and greater technical delicacy.

According to our English notions, the interior represented in this picture seems a very humble one to be the scene of music-lessons; but does not this only illustrate the national love of the art? Besides, the musical professor may be the uncle, or godfather, or neighbour of the young lady. Who knows to the contrary? Or he may be himself only an amateur. Or, to venture another guess, he may be some great operatic manager, who has found a voice which he thinks should be made to belong to a prima donna. The guitars are, however, decidedly against this conjecture; so we must conclude that this laughing signorina is receiving a lesson given wholly or in part in a friendly way, or en famille, by that very good-natured-looking and painstaking old teacher. The interest the barefooted young ragnazetto takes in the lesson is capitally expressed; it keeps him out of probable mischief with grandma's distaff, flax, and shuttle. But the action of grandmamma herself is decidedly ambiguous. Has she a fine ear for music, or no ear at all, that she should take herself off altogether? The master's clapping seems, it is true, to suggest there is something wrong with the time; but who will believe that such a pretty damsel could scare any one away with her voice? Impossible! No, the old dame is probably deaf, and thinking only of lottery-tickets; for, although we have known several old Roman crones, we never found one whose brain was not running on lucky numbers from morn till night.

"MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS BEING LED TO EXECUTION." PAINTED BY VANMITELLI.

THE painting of young Italy —much to the regret of her many friends in this country —was not represented at our International Exhibition either so well as it deserves, or in equal proportion with her sculpture and art-manufactures. The great work by Ussi, "The Expulsion of the Duke of Athens," which we engraved, and some very few others, were all the pictures calculated to remove the prevailing impression that the art of painting expired long since in the country which gave it birth. All who visited the Great Italian Exhibition of some two years since, at Florence, will aver, however, that this is a very false impression—that, on the contrary, painting, like sculpture, is partaking of the national rejuvenescence, and that there are very important schools already on foot, a second Renaissance at Florence and Naples. Yet, not only were such artists as Celantano, Altamura, the painter of the picture we engrave, and many other of the youngest and best painters whose works attracted the chief attention at the Florentine Exhibition, not represented in the international galleries, but the few artists of equally eminent men which found their way here were very badly hung, while some specimens of hopeless inanity were placed on "the line." Morelli's fine picture, "The Iconoclaste," was hoisted some ten feet from the ground, and the beautiful picture of "Bianca e Maria," by the younger Appiani, which we engraved, was placed still higher. The only explanation for this apparent unfairness and the deficiency of good works is that—as we were very creditably informed at the time—a preference had been shown at Florence for the works of the old regime, the productions of the empty, inflated manuscripts who fancy they tread in the steps of the old masters, but in reality, as we have elsewhere said, only blindly follow each other; and that, strange to say, the commissioners were of the "Condini" party, and sought, therefore, to do honour to the Grand Ducal and Bourbon patronage. It was well known that the most distinguished contributors to the Florentine exhibition were very much annoyed at the indiscriminate distribution of the gold medals, and they would not intrust their works again to a similarly-constituted authority. Both the admirable pictures this week engraved were exhibited at Florence, and destined for our international gallery, but, probably for the reasons indicated, were not exhibited. We are, therefore, glad that the opportunity has presented itself of engraving works which must compel a juster recognition of the rising art of Italy.

The large and noble picture by the Neapolitan artist Signor Vanmitelli has very fine qualities of effect and colour; and our Engraving testifies to its excellent drawing and composition, its dramatic feeling, and expression. The painter tells us in the plainest terms possible of the tragedy about to be enacted—that last sad scene, which ended the curiously-chequered life, the "strange eventful history" of the unfortunate Mary Queen of Scots. He tells it us in the black velvet dress of the Queen—in the hard-hearted, savagely-vindictive scowl of the intolerant Earl of Kent and the best brows of two courtiers in the background (one, perhaps, her gaoler, Sir Amias Paulet)—in the passionate grief of Mary Stuart's few but faithful followers, which still included her secretaries and three of her female companions and namesakes—in the presents she distributes, the last bequests and most sacred souvenirs—in the mailed guards, and the messenger holding the sealed warrant of execution from her jealous, cruel, and treacherous "sister" Elizabeth. The painter tells us all this with great good taste, and without the horrible parade of scaffold and headsman, block and axe, in that dreary room of Fotheringay, and that ghastly crowd of upturned faces which, even when shaded and softened with pity, seems each one to sanction the (often) murderous deeds of authority and abet the grim executioner in his bloody duty.

According to tradition, Mary wore when led to execution a costly gold enamel rosary with pendent crucifix and pearl, which had been presented to her by the Pope, and on the scaffold she charged her faithful servant, Sir Andrew Melville, the Master of her Household, to convey the rosary, as a last token, to the Earl and Countess of Arundel, who had befriended her in her long imprisonment. This incident—Sir Henry stooping to kiss the hand which intrusts him with the token—forms the particular "situation" represented in Signor Vanmitelli's picture. And though there are one or two discrepancies (such as the Queen being not yet on the scaffold, and the object presented looking more like a small reliquary), these are entirely unimportant pictorially. It may be thought a rather singular coincidence that this very rosary and crucifix were contributed to the Loan Collection at the South Kensington Museum, and engraved and described, with the historical particulars of its preservation, in the Number of this Journal for Dec. 13 last.

FINE ARTS.

PHOTOGRAPHS OF TURNER'S "LIBER STUDIORUM."

THERE is no doubt that the "Liber Studiorum" of Turner originated in the same rivalry with Claude which urged the English painter, when bequeathing two of his best pictures to the nation, to add the condition that they should be placed side by side with two of the French master's best works. Whatever may be thought of the relative merits of the pictures so placed in juxtaposition, there can be no question that the "Liber Studiorum" of Turner is a more comprehensive and valuable repository of landscape art that the "Liber Veritatis" of Claude. But this is to be explained by the circumstances under which the two collections were produced, without the detraction of the older painter. And we may, by-the-way, remark that few can examine the original drawings by Claude for his pictures without perceiving that he studied Nature far more closely and faithfully than Mr. Ruskin seems to believe. Claude's drawings for his "Liber Veritatis" were executed, not for show or sale, but for a publication, but as memoranda to identify the pictures he had produced. Early in his career his fame and success had brought him many followers and imitators. Some of these adapted and copied his works with so much verisimilitude as to often succeed in foisting their spurious productions on the amateur as original paintings by the master. To at once protect the purchaser from imposition and to guard his own reputation from injustice Claude from a certain period made drawings of every picture he painted, and recorded on them the names of the persons who commissioned them and the place of their destination. Painting an enormous number of pictures, these drawings accumulated till they formed a large collection, which he divided into volumes, calling them "Books of Truth," not because the drawings testified to his fidelity to Nature, but because they authenticated his veritable works. At his death he is said to have left six of these "Libri di Verità." Only one of these volumes is stated to have been preserved; the rest of the drawings appear to have been dispersed or lost. This volume (probably more than a sixth part of the whole) contains 200 drawings, executed in bistre-washes, with occasional heightenings of white. After Claude's death this collection was sold by one of his nephews for 200 Italian crowns to a Frenchman, who took it to Paris and offered it to the King; but, the purchase being declined, it was shortly afterwards bought by the Duke of Devonshire (of two removes since), and now forms one of the many art-treasures at Chatsworth.

These drawings were very admirably engraved in mezzotint by Earlom, and the publication of the plates intended to strengthen that unfair and exclusive admiration of Claude, the revulsion from which he probably caused the equally unfair detraction of his real merits and claims upon respect—if only for, as Mr. Ruskin admits, "first having placed the sun in the heavens." Another volume was published from the scattered drawings, but many of the plates are spoorphal. At the same time these mezzotinto were being diffused, with many other engravings from Claude's works, Sir George Beaumont, himself an amateur painter of "classical" landscape and, partly for this reason, an acknowledged leader of the taste of the aristocracy (and there were in those days comparatively few patrons of art out of their ranks), lent the whole weight of his authority to raise the old master high in the above any modern competitor. It was the injustice of the blind and exclusive admiration of Sir George, and of the fashion he represented. It is very excusable, therefore, that after having fairly challenged Claude in oil pictures, by a series of works, and hardly any noble, purchasers, Turner should propose to rival him in designs for the engraver, especially as he had already tried his powers in this direction; several mezzotinto from his designs having been published, some of which had met with more appreciation than his pictures.

Such, then, was the origin of the "Liber Studiorum," a work upon which Turner was engaged at intervals from 1807 till 1816. Unlike Claude, however, Turner's definite intention and ambition seem to have been that his "Book of Studies" should contain the ideal of not a few but the widest variety of landscape art; that the painter should rival not one but any landscape-painter, land or living—should represent, either in a measure literally, or through the glorious medium of his matchless imagination, the prose or poetry, the action, or the subtle aspects of Nature, the sweetest or the most stupendous phenomena of all the elements. And—also unlike his great predecessor—he, in seeking to compose this great epic of art, lavished upon it extreme care and constant watchfulness, examining every stage of the engravers' progress, altering, correcting, emending, and doing much of the engraving with his own hands. To indicate the comprehensiveness of the scheme, the subjects were divided into six heads—viz., historical, pastoral, elegant pastoral, mountain, marine, and architectural. Mr. Lewis was the first engraver employed, but he soon declined proceeding, from the painter's inadequate remuneration.

well known that Turner deeply felt the

Mr. Charles Turner was the next; but he also deserted the task for the same reason. Messrs. Reynolds, Dunkerton, Lupton, Sky, Dawe, &c., were subsequently engaged; but Turner himself engraved some of his own drawings and etchings. As the plates were, the painter made successive alterations, sometimes reversing the whole effect. In the numbers in which the work was originally published one good impression would be found with others from a very bad "state" of the plates. Some collectors have very interesting and instructive collections of the etchings, the artist's proofs, and different states of the plate. But even long before the later plates were published it became extremely difficult to secure a set of good impressions. The rarity of them has gradually enhanced the price, till a good copy of the "Liber" now sells for 200 guineas* The work has, in fact, long been quite out of the reach of ordinary purchasers. We cannot be too thankful, therefore, for the two series of admirable photographs, by Mr. Thurston Thompson, from Turner's original sepia drawings for the "Liber" in the South Kensington Museum, published by Messrs. Cundall, Downes, and Co., of New Bond-street, under the sanction of the Department of Science and Art. The first series, published last year, comprises thirty drawings, and the second series, just published, twenty-one. Turner intended that the number of the plates should extend to one hundred, but it only reached seventy - one (including the frontispiece). The work did not pay during the publication, and it stopped as soon as Turner began the "England and Wales" and found more profitable employment. Twenty subjects remain, therefore, to be photographed. The drawings of these are not at South Kensington, but dispersed among various collections. Every effort, however, will, we understand, be made to complete the work. Some of these photographs have not the subtle and more carefully-studied effects seen in certain of the plates; part of the scale of gradation is not clearly given in a few of them; but such occasional deficiencies are far more than compensated by the inestimable advantage of having a facsimile in every case of the veritable handiwork of, "take him for all in all," the greatest master of landscape-painting the world has seen. For teaching drawing, light and shade, and composition; the varied character of foliage, architecture, and shipping; mountain, valley, and plain; the phenomena of calm, storm, and gentle breeze; earth, air, and sky,—the divers sentiment all these may convey, according to the feeling of the artist; all, in fine, of the leading principles of landscape art; there is no collection of examples which could be placed before the student, whether "private" or in our public schools — none which the lover of Nature or the admirer of Turner could procure, at once so valuable yet so cheap. It would be useless within our limits to attempt to give any detailed description of, or to offer any serviceable remarks on, fifty-one drawings, almost any one of which might demand the space of an article. We may, however, refer to the first volume of "Modern Painters," in which Mr. Ruskin justly remarks that, although among the earliest of the series of the "Liber Studiorum" occur the magnificent "Mont St. Gothard" and "Little Devil's Bridge," it is remarkable that after Turner's acquaintance with this scenery, "so congenial in almost all respects with the energy of his mind, and supplying him with materials of which, in these two subjects and in the 'Chartreuse,' and several others afterwards, he showed both his entire appreciation and command, the proportion of English to foreign subjects should in the rest of the work be more than two to one, and that those English subjects should be, almost all of them, of a kind peculiarly simple and of everyday occurrence, such as the Pembury Mill, the Farnyard composition with the white horse, that with the cocks and pigs, Hedging and Ditching, Watermen Gathering, and the beautiful and solemn rustic subject, called 'A Watermill;' and that the architectural subjects, instead of being taken, as might have been expected of an artist so fond of treating effects of extended space, from some of the enormous Continental masses, are almost exclusively British: Rivaulx, Holy Island, Dunstan, Dunstanborough, Chepstow, St. Katharine's Greenwich Hospital, an English Parish Church, a Saxon Ruin, and an exquisite combination of the English Lowland Castle in the pastoral, with the brook, wooden bridge, and wild duck; to all of which we may add, as belonging foreign to oppose but three slight, ill-considered, and unsatisfactory subjects from Rade, Lauffenbourg, and Thun." Mr. Ruskin further remarks that the British subjects are treated with greater fulness and completeness. "Compare the figures and sheep in the Hedging and Ditching, and the East Gate, Winchelsea, together with the near foliage, with the puzzled foreground, and inappropriate figures of the Lake of Thun; or the cattle and road of the St. Catherine's Hill, with the foreground of the Bonneville; or the exquisite figure with the sheaf of corn in the Watermill with the vintagers of the Grenoble subject." In the foliage of the foreign drawings there are "reminiscences of English willows by the brooks, and English forest glades mingle even with the heroic foliage of the Æsacus and Hesperie, and the Cephalus." Turner does not master the stone-pine, or the pine of Switzerland. Of all foreign countries, he most entirely entered into the spirit of France. His Swiss subjects in the "Liber" are more intensely felt than those of many of his pictures, but, till somewhat later, he "appears rather to have taken from Switzerland sketches and general conceptions of size, and of ground form and effect, to be used in his after compositions, than to have attempted the seizing of its local character." The effect of Italy upon his mind is very puzzling. On the one hand, it gave him the solemnity and power which are manifested in the historical compositions of the "Liber Studiorum," more especially the "Rizpah," the "Cephalus," the "Scene from the Fairy Queen," and the "Æsacus and Hesperie;" on the other, he seems never to have entered thoroughly into the spirit of Italy, and the materials he obtained there were afterwards but awkwardly introduced in his large compositions.* Artists and the public alike owe Mr. Ruskin a great debt of gratitude, and the opinions of this acute, earnest, and most eloquent writer are always interesting, especially on any question relating to Turner, even if we cannot agree with them. And, we must confess, we see nothing singular in the fact that Turner, or any other British painter, should represent precisely those scenes best with which he was most familiar. Nor can we see that the melancholy feeling Mr. Ruskin finds so frequently in the "Liber Studiorum" is by any means general. A large proportion of the subjects were obviously painted with a heart glowing with gratitude for the loveliness of Nature, and the figures are often amusing themselves, sometimes in a very undignified manner.

"MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS BEING LED TO EXECUTION," BY VANMITELLI, OF NAPLES.

The distribution of Queen's prizes to the students of the Liverpool School of Science took place last Saturday evening in the concert-room, St. George's Hall—Professor Owen in the chair. There are upwards of 140 students now on the roll of the school, and it is likely to become one of the most prosperous and practically useful of the local colleges.

CHAPEL OF ST. JOHN, IN THE WHITE TOWER.

Were wandering, in these modern days, in the vast and bustling metropolis, it is curious to notice the numerous and important changes which are constantly going forward. Ever since the commencement of the present century the aspects of the chief thoroughfares have been materially altered; but, great as have been the transformations, if we glance at the plans of London which were made about three centuries ago, it is still more surprising to note to what a great extent old things have given way to new. From the Tower to the Temple, the Great Fire swept away every vestige of ancient date, the venerable fortress and the beautiful church of the Knights of the Temple fortunately escaping.

Along the Strand, York House, Old Somerset House, the Savoy Palace, and many of the homes and gardens of the nobility which stood along this margin of the Thames have been removed, and the sites differently occupied. The walls of the city, and the gates and postern, have, with the exception of a few unimportant fragments, also disappeared.

Besides the demolition of ancient structures caused by various conflagrations and the sure decay of time, such has been the effect of the numerous alterations rendered necessary by the increase of trade and business, and the peculiar requirements of various periods, that buildings of even Queen Elizabeth's reign are not now numerous in the central parts of the metropolis, and, as a matter of course, the architectural remains of older periods are still more rare. For instance, although we have clear evidence that an important Roman city stood for about five hundred years on part of the present site of London, there is, so far as we know, only one portion of Roman date which can be seen standing at this day in its original position. This is part of a Roman bath, which has been preserved on the spot where it was found, in one of the vaults below the Coal Exchange, near Billingsgate. Portions of walls, the basements of buildings, tessalated pavement, coin - vessels, arms, &c., of Roman workmanship, have from time to time been discovered; but these have been either removed to museums or covered from view.

The only buildings of Anglo-Saxon date now remaining in the metropolis are the massive circular archway called the dark cloister, some walls near, and, perhaps, the crypt now called the "Pix Office," Westminster Abbey.

Of Norman date there still stand some small parts of St. Saviour's Church, Southwark; a considerable portion of the choir of St. Bartholomew the Great, Smithfield; the crypt below Bow Church, Cheapside; a chamber below Lamb's Chapel, Cripplegate; part of the exterior of the south transept, Westminster Abbey; the transition part of the Temple Church; and the great keep or citadel of the Tower of London, which has for so long withstood all the vicissitudes of troubled times.

The general appearance of the White Tower is so familiar to most readers that it does not require particular description; it is, however, be worth while to mention that, although the exterior details of this building have been sadly disfigured by casing and restorations in the architectural style of James I.'s reign, the interior has been but little interfered with; and the walls, of immense massiveness and strength, will, except some extraordinary force is used against them, remain firmly for many ages to come. Whether we consider the White Tower as one of the rare examples of the Norman style of architecture which is left remaining in the capital, its curiosity as an important specimen of the means of defence used in the years which have gone, the very perfect condition of the various internal parts, or on account of the historical and other associations connected with it, it must be a place of the highest interest. Adjoining the Palace, which formed the residence of a long line of English Kings and Queens, is the Chapel, the council-chamber, the apartments which once formed the prison of Sir Walter Raleigh, &c. (in the latter there are now exhibited the valuable collection of arms and armour), and the armoury an important and stately occasion. Taking this into consideration, it is with much pleasure that we are able to give the engraving on page 32 of the Chapel of St. John in the condition in which it at present appears, and to state that early in May next the public will be admitted to it and also to some other portions of the White Tower which have been inaccessible to visitors. For upwards of a century the council-chamber and the chapel, which adjoins it, have been filled from the floors to the roofs with wooden frames and presses in which were kept the Rolls and other national records, which have now been removed to the new building in Fetter-lane. But, although the huge masses of documents have been taken from the council-chamber, it seems that space here is too valuable to be left unoccupied, and this apartment is being prepared for the reception of several thousand

* The subscription price of the "Liber Studiorum" was £17 16s. Mr. Thornbury, in his "Life of Turner," says (vol. i., p. 286) :—" Before his death a copy sold for thirty-one guineas, and since his death fine copies have sold for £200." This astonishing assertion is only one of the innumerable mistakes and misrepresentations which, together with much bad taste, disfigured of a "copy" being understood (as equally implied) in both cases, the known state, besides many duplicates of each separate plate; a collection afterwards brought, when broken up, the sum named.

* The ancient palace, which was occupied by so many Sovereigns, consisted of a range of buildings which stretched from the White Tower southward towards the Bloody Tower, and eastwards towards the Salt Tower. All traces of this palace have been long since removed, and the site partly covered with warehouses for military stores, offices, &c.

rifles and other small arms, which will be arranged in a manner somewhat similar to those which occupied the chief part of the Elizabethan armoury, which was destroyed by fire some years ago.

The council-chamber and chapel are at a considerable height above the ground of Tower-green, and are reached by two circular staircases of curious construction; one of these is on the north and the other on the west side of the White Tower: these are formed in the thickness of the masonry. Here and there are loopholes, in which may be seen the great strength of the main walls of the Keep. At the foot of the staircase on the west side, in the reign of Charles II., there was found a wooden box in which were a quantity of bones, which were supposed to have been those of the youthful Princes, whom, the tradition of the old fortress says, were put to death in the Bloody Tower by order of their uncle, the Duke of Gloucester. In the reign of King Charles these relics were inclosed and buried in the north aisle of Henry VII.'s Chapel, below a pedestal on which a long Latin inscription was placed, the particulars of this discovery. We must mention, however, that the place and circumstances of the deaths of those unfortunate children must be left in a state of uncertainty.

The council-chamber is a large apartment, lighted by a row of semicircular-headed windows. The roof is flat, and supported by rows of rough timber-posts. The appearance of the place when cleared of the papers, &c., is very imposing; but, doubtless, in the olden time the bare effect was relieved by tapestry hangings and other suitable fittings. If space would permit, many interesting events connected with this apartment could have occurred here. It was in this chamber that the Duke of Gloucester rose from the council-table and admitted a body of armed men who, by the duke's orders, arrested Lord Hastings and other partizans of his enemy, Lord Hastings was immediately taken outside the Keep, beheaded on some logs of timber which had been brought into the Tower-green for the purpose of making some repairs in the adjoining buildings; others were committed to close custody, but were released much sooner.

From some of the deeply-recessed windows of the White Tower we have glimpses of the Tower of St. Peter, in which the Princess Elizabeth Queen and a large number of persons of note who have suffered execution lie buried. Beyond the outer walls and across the moat, northward, is the site on which was so often set up the scaffold on Tower-hill. The last who were beheaded here were Lords Balmerino, Kilmarnock, and Lovat, for the unfortunate northern rebellion of 1745. Looking westward, within the walls of the fortress, may still be seen, at a short distance from the Chapel of St. Peter, the square piece on which the Queen's House stood, which was the scene of death to two Queens of Henry VIII., Lady Jane Grey, her husband, Sir Walter Raleigh, Lord Essex, and many other persons.

There is a very ancient tradition that on the site of the Tower there was a Roman stronghold, and, in consequence, the White Tower has been called the Roman Keep or Tower. We find a similar tradition in connection with the keeps of Kenilworth and some others of Norman date; but in connection with the White Tower there is no visible evidence of Roman construction. Near the basement, where some alterations have been lately made, there appear to be a few Roman bricks; and the same may be seen near the bottom of some of the other towers which defend the inner wall. These bricks have been brought from the ruins of the walls of the Roman city, which stretched westward; for we are not aware that any Roman remains exist which indicate that buildings of importance were here during the occupation of London by the Romans.

THE COLONIES.

FROM the statistics for 1850 of the colonies and other possessions of the United Kingdom, just published, it appears that the area of those colonies and possessions at that time was 5,319,049 square miles; total population, according to the latest returns, 127,548,000; the total revenue of the same possessions was £56,013,411. The total of the public debt is not given, owing to the absence of returns from some of the colonies; but the total for the debts of most of the colonies were £100,357,475—viz., from the mother country £14,817,899, and from colonial sources, £85,539,576. The total commerce was £74,145,000—viz., to the United Kingdom £31,329,229, and to other countries £19,615,457. The total tonnage entered inwards and outwards from the ports in those colonies was 22,175,649, of which 6,229,064 belonged to foreign countries.

The population of the British Empire, exclusive of the mainland of the colonies, &c., was as follows:—India—area, 933,722 square miles; population, 115,634,742—viz., Hindoos, 94,000,000; Mahometans, 21,000,000; Christians, 426,107; Jews, 9,000; North American Colonies (Canada, &c.)—area, 521,152 square miles; population, 2,436,297; Australasia—area, 3,000,000; population, 87,987,747. The total public debt cannot be stated, as there is no return for Sierra Leone; but the total revenue is £2,114,440, and the total commerce £1,605,014. West Indies (including British Guiana)—area, 92,394; population, 1,020,000; revenue, £1,000,000; commerce, £5,000,000. Africa, £5,578,026; St. Vincent are both without any debt. Australia, Cape of Good Hope—area, 250,000 square miles; population, 150,000; £6,317,941; expenditure (exclusive of New Zealand), £5,777,290. The total public debt is £1,540,000. The total revenue is £1,000,000, and the total commerce £1,000,000. Mauritius—area, 700 square miles; population, 180,000; £1,418,396. The total debt for New South Wales is £1,820,240, and Victoria, £5,118,100.

The tonnage of the vessels entering the ports in India was 4,899,952, of which 2,218,861 belonged to the United Kingdom, 1,264,585 to the colonies, &c., and 716,506 to foreign countries. The tonnage of vessels entering Australia's tonnage, 4,886,792, of which 858,288 belonged to foreign countries. West Indies—tonnage, 1,000,000, of which 342,271 belonged to foreign countries. Australia—total tonnage, 2,978,558, of which 646,781 belonged to foreign countries.

The imports and exports, of which the general total is given above, were of the following values:—Imports from and exports to the United Kingdom—India, £26,502,899; North America, £4,883,272; West Indies, £2,500,000; Australia, £6,000,000. Imports from and exports to foreign countries—India, £14,118,396; North America, £1,101,183; West Indies, £2,956,325; Australia, £11,417,511; Cape of Good Hope—India, £1,261,000; North America, £3,674,949; West Indies, £4,476,118; Australia, £12,502,398. Exports to other countries—India, £1,000,000; North America, £7,318,753; West Indies, £1,229,367; and Australia, £9,479,888.

A circular has been issued from the War Office announcing a revision of the regulations of the volunteer force. Sir G. Lewis says that having this revision in view, he will not be prepared to submit for her Majesty's acceptance the new code of regulations for the force until the middle of January.

"A feat of arms," says the Constitutionnel, "has just been performed in Senegal which is worthy of mention. A detachment of fourteen French soldiers, under the command of a non-commissioned officer, were intrenched in the port of Kealakh, kept in check for fourteen hours, and finally repulsed in a sortie by a body of 1,500 soldiers of the Serawoolli tribe, named Mahin and Macodou. When the enemy retired before such heroic resistance, they left behind them 300 corpses from which to count the more severely borne. The remainder of the army fled in disorder across the Saloum."

We find the following interesting account of Arab runners or couriers in an able article by General Daumas, published in this fortnight's Revue Contemporaine:—"The Arab runners are one of those sights which no one of these singular men—Ben-Sayahne, about thirty-five years of age in 1838, Ben Sali, younger than he, Ben Ghedda, somewhat older than the latter—could miss a notice short surmounted by a light burnous; a few cords stuck into his belt, to form a girdle; a gun in the hand, and a long pair of pistols in the arms a kind of sandals, which he used to manufacture himself out of camel and goat's skin, and which he bound round his feet; and his equipment was completed his equipment. The Arabs maintained that he had received from God the gift of wings. He was the only person whose voice was heard in the wildest regions, and that of being able to live upon the smallest quantity possible of food. He was the only man who, in the midst of the most profound secret message to Abd-el-Kader, and, starting from a place called El-Had, six leagues from Jaffa, he arrived at Tagradoun, where Abd-el-Kader was on the following morning.

The Metropolitan Board of Works have directed the following alterations in the names of thoroughfares:—Bear-lane, Bear-yard, and Bear-street, to "Tichborne-street," Regent-street, to be abolished, and the thoroughfare to be considered a continuation of Swallow-street. The following thoroughfares to be called Lower Copenhagen-street, Copenhagen-street West, William-street, Dorset-street, Chapel-street, Richmond-terrace, Bryce-street, Copenhagen-terrace, Eagle-terrace, George-terrace, Clyde-terrace, Clayton-terrace, and Hamilton-terrace, Islington, to be called Copenhagen-street. Hamilton-place, Dean Maiden-lane to Park-road to be called Copenhagen-street. In St. George's-in-the-East, the thoroughfare from Cannon-street-road, and King David-lane to be abolished, and the whole line of thoroughfare to be called Settles-street-lane. The name of Catherine-street to be abolished, and the line of thoroughfare to be called Anthony-street. Plumstead: The names of Barrage-place, Upper Barrage-place, Cambridge-terrace, Zetland-villas, Clarendon-villas, Prescott-place, Cumberland-terrace, and Yarborough-villas, to be abolished, and the whole line of thoroughfare to be called Barrage-road. The names of Southampton Place, Hope-place, Melbourne-place, Fox-place, Fort-place, Victoria-place, Berkeley-terrace, and Bright-terrace, to be abolished, and the whole line of thoroughfare to be called Sandy-hill. The names of Walmer-terrace and Suffolk-terrace to be abolished, and the line of thoroughfare to be called Walmer-road. The names of Raglan-road East, Somerset-terrace, and Fitzroy-terrace, to be abolished, and the whole line of thoroughfare to be called Raglan-road.

INDOOR AMUSEMENTS.

Now that the evenings are dark and chilly the need of enjoying them within doors is strongly felt. Games are the natural resort of those who, comfortably tired with the day's exertion, desire to keep themselves occupied, but without overtaxing the mental or bodily powers. Say what you please in favour of more intellectual instructions, there is no denying the superiority of games as a good game.

The nature and nature of games are legion. Of all the ingenious contrivances for driving dull care away, and for preventing, in this railroad age, too great activity either of body or mind, games at cards have the supremacy, and, indeed, they admit of the greatest variations so endless. Let it not be supposed that in mentioning cards we are recommending the vice of gambling; on the contrary, those who at some round game for bonbons or for postage stamps, or, perhaps, our counters are ignorance above. These round games furnish great fun to children, and they are very suitable for the social evenings when the older ones do not find interest enough in more games of chance, as they are called. The game of whist is singularly fortunate in having the squire, the parson, the lawyer, and the doctor—the usual quartet in country places—get up a rubber at silver threepennies.

Just in proportion as games of chance excite the interest, so games of skill excite too much. Chess, for example, is hardly a recreation; indeed, great players make chess their real work. We find the joint rubbers in games of mixed chance and skill which have this desirable quality; the watching of the chances gives the onlookers time to think how they would have availed themselves of them, while by skilful play afford just enough excitement to keep us pleasantly and easily employed. The game of whist is singularly fortunate in combining chance and skill in such proportions as at once to enlist both strong and weak players. In addition to this the constitution of the game is so simple that it may be learned by merely watching a hand or two. Admiral Burney relates of a young friend of his, who, when told that the game of whist was all over the world, exclaimed that the highest wins the trick, and so on, replied, "If that is all, I shall be able to play as well as any one in twenty-four hours." Before he was twenty-four hours old he had mastered the game.

Whist, the best of all domestic games, is eminently a scientific game. It is played by the light of science, and, however simple it may at a little, they would be surprised at the great additional pleasure the game would then afford. For this purpose, perhaps, the little book of "Cavendish on Whist," published by Mr. Bentley, Piccadilly, is the best. Whether played scientifically or not, whist, and indeed all games, should be played for small stakes only, in order to be inoffensive of undue excitement is to play for very moderate stakes, but even then it is so provoking to see games thrown away by bad play that many persons prefer their imitations.

There is another game, but little played in this country, which is hardly inferior to whist—that is, écarté for two. It is a long way the best game at cards for two persons. It is a little more difficult to learn than whist, but it has the advantage for lady players that there is only one trump suit to keep in the head. An excellent description of piquet, as played abroad, was published in Macmillan's Magazine in December, 1851. We now proceed to offer a few remarks upon the popular game of whist:—

THE GAME OF WHIST

Whist, then, delightful whist, my theme shall be;
Sweet is thy name, and sweet thy mystery.
And show what sage and comprehensive mind
Gave to the world a science so refined.

Through worse enlightened efforts whist became
A sober, serious, scientific game;
That random strokes disgrace our play no more,
But skill presides where all was chance before.

What," a Poem in twelve cantos, published, Magazine in December, 1851. A new process to offer a few remarks upon the popular game of whist:—

It may not be generally known that a hundred and fifty years or more have been required to develop what to its present perfection. Little is known of its origin, but it is probable that it originally had no definite origin, but is, like our glorious Constitution, the result of a long succession of experiments. It was considered to be a game of chance, and was played abroad, was published in "Games and Sports," with similar games, Whisk, Whist and Swabbers, Ruff and Honours, Slam, and perhaps Quadrille, contributing to the result. The earliest mention of Whist in this country is in a work of 1662, a book published in 1680. In this work Cotton speaks of ruff and honours (alias slam) and the game of swabbers. In 1743 Hoyle first wrote, and says that they were commonly known in England. Ruff and honours was played by four persons, two being partners, as at whist. Twelve cards were dealt to each player, and the rest put aside. To the stock, the top card of the stock being turned up for trumps. Whoever had the ace of trumps was compelled by the rules of the game to take in the stock (this was called "ruffing"), and then the game proceeded much as at whist. Parquhar, in the "Beaux Stratagem," published in 1707, refers to whist in a manner implying that

It may seem to some that we are hypercritical over these laws. Let us remind our readers that to be printed laws all rules are to be clear as the polished brook, and while we give Colebs every credit for the work he has done, we disapprove of his saying that his laws are "in accordance with the regulations of all the best whist-clubs of the present day."

Lieutenant-Colonel H ——'s is a prettily-got-up book, the different positions in the text being illustrated by coloured diagrams representing the cards. We confess that the author's ideas of the game, in many instances, do not coincide with ours.

Cavendish approaches the game in a spirit totally different from that of his predecessors. He does not consider the game worthless because of his pecuniary loss, and to lay down its general principles, together with the reasons upon which they are based. Your hand is unworthy, in no place is master but all who may play a good card. Thus, we may ask, why do you win with the lowest of a sequence? Many, no doubt, do it because they have been told it is right, or, at all events, wrong; but it is not always wrong, and the custom is the carrying out of a principle which is founded upon the most scientific principle. Cavendish thus explains it—

"Suppose you hold a trick you throw away your lowest card to economise your strength. Thus, with queen and two small ones you would throw away the queen to your left. Assuming that you have only, young players mostly commit the error of supposing that their discard is of no consequence; now it is probably, in regard to the value of the chance of making tricks; but it is of great importance in affording information to partner. . . . The principle is naturally extended to sequence. Thus, say knave is led, and you (second hand) have ace and king: if you put on the king, your partner gains the very important information that you have the ace also. For leave as to this important information, see (vide analysis of leads), so the leader cannot lead from ace, knave, &c. (vide analysis of leads), or he would win the trick; and third hand cannot have it, or he would win the king; and the fourth, not having it himself, knows that you have it.

If you put on the ace, not only could he not tell that you have the king, but would presume that it lay with the adversary" (P. 24).

After considering the case, the youngest tyro can never forget the advantage of winning with the lowest of a sequence.

The next point of the game we similarly but more briefly treated. Thus, on the question of asking for trumps, we find that—

"It is a common error with young players to be led, to drop a high card in the adversary's lead, to induce him to believe that you will trump it next round; whereupon the leader will very likely change the suit, and perhaps lead trumps. Thus, if he has king (from ace, king, and others), and you hold queen and one other, it is evident that you cannot make the queen . . . if you throw the queen to his king, he may lead a trump to prevent your trumping his ace; but if he goes on with the suit, and you now drop your small card, he knows that he has been enticed to lead a trump. Your partner should take the hint, and, if he gets the lead, lead trumps; for if you wish that suit led it is of little consequence from whom the lead comes. By a logical extension of this principle, Mr. Cavendish says that a superfluity of high cards is a sign (after the smaller card drops) that you want trumps led. This is a recognised signal, and is called asking for trumps" (P. 34).

Many players are of opinion that the signal for trumps is an illegitimate trick, and that it could never follow from the principles of the game. Cavendish gives us an inkling of the arguments in its favour, but his are not nearly all that could be advanced.

In discarding, the principle comes out still clearer. If the second hand refuses to trump, and throws away a high card instead of a small, it is clear that his hand must consist mainly of trumps and of the third suit, with considerable strength in each. His partner should at once lead trumps. So much for the rule for trumps which has been invented.

All this being admitted, it may still be objected that these are special instances, where you have an opportunity of showing your game; but that they do not justify the discard of a three before a two, or any other occasion that you wish for a trump lead. We admit that this is a convention. The question arises where, then, is the line to be drawn? Is the principle to be confined to one suit only, and assound for tens and nines? The answer is that no line can be drawn. Asking for trumps with small cards is, as Cavendish says, a logical extension of the principle, and the convention (for such a justification is needed) by analogy.

Such an argument, probably the most striking, is drawn from the practice in returned leads. In the second round of a suit, if the then leader has but two of it left, he returns the highest; if more than two, the lowest. The reason why will be best given in his words:—

"In the case that you and your partner are both numerically strong, the system here presents him from unnecessarily leading that which must be trumped the third round. If you only are strong and your partner is weak, he supports your strong suit by not finessing it. If your partner is weak, you naturally return it to him with you later that your partner is strong. You then return a strengthening card, by not a high card of equal strength, which would be likely to enable him to finesse and to keep the command in his own hand."— (P. 21.)

This is perfectly sound if you have only one high card and one low card left. With two low cards only, say five and six, it is not pretended that it strengthens your partner by returning the six; but it you enable him, when you afterwards play the five, to calculate that you hold no more of the suit. This, however, is a convention rather arising from a logical extension of a principle to small cards. So far from being objected to, no one can be a player who departs from it. It is striking errors, thus, that are contended against, and argued and to oppose another.

We must not pass over the most original feature in Cavendish. He gives a number of hands played through at the table, the play being accompanied (like printed games at chess) with remarks and explanations. We have rendered the hands very amusing to ourselves by employing a fifth person to sort them, and then getting four others to play them, as at whist. After each hand Cavendish either refers to the text, and sees in how far the play agrees with or differs from that advised. The hands are played in a masterly style, and exhibit what he always inculcates beginners, the management of the hand at advanced periods.

As regards the model of instruction and the ease with which it is conveyed, Cavendish is certainly without a rival; and, as regards the reliability of his information, he is to the present school what Hoyle was to the past. No doubt the book as it stands may be received, read and will find many admirers; but we think the author has not acted wisely in not completing the laws. It is unwise to publish principles, as the principles, is introduced in a fiction edition, we venture confidently to predict for the work a reputation more extended than that of perhaps any other.

The Council-General of Martinique has rejected the convention concluded with England for the recruitment of coolies, and has expressed a wish for the introduction of negroes from the United States.

The Surinam papers state that a few weeks ago some of the slaves waited upon his Excellency the Governor, and, in their own more as well as in behalf of their fellow-slaves, returned thanks for the great boon bestowed upon them by his Majesty, by the abolition of slavery on the 1st of July, 1863, as had been announced, and also for the kind language addressed to them by his Excellency in his proclamation. They were kindly received by the Governor, who impressed upon them the necessity of being calm and contented, of awaiting the period of their liberation, and of proving, by their industry, obedience, and faithful discharge of their duty, that they were worthy of the boon assured to them.

THE NEW GOVERNMENT OFFICES.

"The Battle of the Styles" has been fought in Committee, and the victory is to the Italian: the foundations of the new offices have been laid in "solid concrete;" and on the quadrangle formed by Downing-street and Charles-street, and St. James's-park and King-street, are to be erected the Foreign Office, the Indian Office, the Colonial Office, and the Tay Office. In the clearance for these buildings some interesting localities and dwellings have been swept away.

The clearance was begun so long ago as 1828, when was taken down the south side of Downing-street; at the corner, next King-street, was the noted Cap and Bagpipe, used as a chophouse in early life by George Rose, subsequently Secretary to the Treasury; and one of the earliest precursors of a railway here. Soane had nearly completed the Government Offices in Whitehall, and forming part of the north side of Downing-street, and was then proceeding to extend the north side of Downing-street, but this has been delayed five and thirty the elevation southward; but this has been delayed five and thirty years, while the public business has been carried on in various localities, sometimes in private houses. Downing-street, as it now is, was harshly critical; but the interior, especially the Council Chamber, is handsome and the staircase is excellent. It occupies the site of the royal tennis-court. In 1846-8 Soane's exterior was altered, a portion of the old York House front taken down, and the façade completed by Barry, as we now see it.

Of Downing-street little more than its north-west angle remains: it was, however, until our time, the residence of persons of more than political celebrity; for, at the beginning of the present century, the First Lord of the Treasury alone had his official residence here. In the First Lord of the Treasury alone had his official residence here. In the First Lord of the Treasury alone had his official residence here. In

The following day a portion of the mission took up their abode in the Kobury House en chaer, in order to make survey, before the march to Kobury House en chaer, in order to make survey, before the march to the capital, the elder members remaining in their more comfortable quarters on board the Gorgon until the day of departure. On next day the governor sent a present of three oxen, some sugarcane, rice, maize, and tamarind, so as to express the "sense of the goodness of the country, in the language, or, as he expressed it, "sense of the friendship existing between Kalama and Britain, and in token of the desire of the Queen to cultivate with him and Victoria. This custom was capable of rice, fowls, cocoa, eggs, &c., in order to express the cordiality of the relations existing between Kalama and the name of Kalama. At 3:30, on the same day, the officers of the thirteenth honour consisted with the Governor. At 2:30, all the officers of the mission, accompanied with other officers, a band, and a guard of honour, were formed as before, and proceeded another time to the fort. The reception was performed as before, and proceeded to the fort, where they were received by the Governor in the Governor's house, and was the hall that in the lower room of which the Governor lived. The apartment was an exceedingly good one; and the table was furnished in what was considered more than a sufficient manner for a public dinner in what are considered the more civilized parts of the world. The toasts were the usual ones, viz., the health of the Queen, the Governor, and the officers of the fort, the highest officer next to the Governor, a thirteenth honour of 21 guns, in the name of the mission. Before rising from the table, the mission requested that the healths of the Queen of England and King of Malacca, the Governor, and the Governor This request was drunk in the upper room, and was responded to by three cheers, proposed that it should be drunk in the upper room, and was responded to by three cheers, which were given with the hands playing on the Kalama Malacca Band in the upper chamber, but, with the hands playing on the healths of the two Sovereigns the guard of honour in the band at the same time. By Monday, the 11th, they were enthusiastically drunk united in one. The Governor's band was engaged for a sufficient number of days and has been engaged for the conveyance of the heavy part of the stores, and 194 were dispatched in the course of the same day.

The following day the mission, with the store necessary for consumption on the road, and the heavy part of the baggage, left Kobury House en chaer, a party of 256 men, making a total number of marching party, and half a dollar for his food. The war had now taken place between the two countries was agreed to being more than double what was demanded before the commencement of hostilities. Europeans of the mission, as a guard by the way to Amatanzanee (Hibyadaa), ground of the mission, on the hand as far as the Kalama-Shoe (Hibyadaa), ground about eight miles from Tamatave. But before taking leave of the Europeans, a slight sketch of the town and neighbourhood may make their departure somewhat more intelligible to those who have not visited Madagascar. Tamatave is built up on a tongue of land, or low ridge of sand, of two miles in length, by about a quarter in breadth, on the principal street, about 18th broad, and bounded by fences made of upright branches, about 5ft. high. The houses (Mandrin), built with bamboo frames. These streets run from the point or spit, which is the landing-place, in the direction of the south, and the road leading from the fort to the capital, in the direction of the north. The streets are not paved, but are watered in the rainy season, and are then not unwholesome, but the greater part of them are but wretched huts, built upon raised floors, under which the pigs, fowls, and ducks, women and children, live promiscuously but nevertheless little compunction who cause so much irritation to travellers in the country. The native population of the town, as stated by the traveller's palm, skewered together on pieces of this wood, and the roofs are thatched with the palm leaf. The houses are built in such a manner as to be very close to one another horizontally, the leaf part, which spirits into threads about an inch in length, and which is used for the purpose of thatching. It is very thick. The few better houses referred to, such as the Kobury House, are built of wood, similar to those in the Mauritius, but with the roofs of the Malagasy description. There is a market or bazaar, not very famous in appearance, being merely a space at the side of the fort, in which is held the principal business repair on the ground with their goods—principally fowls, meat, rice, maize, manioc, grass for cattle, &c. This is found of them. The principal articles of trade are particularly cheap, as it is there the dirt of the town is thrown indiscriminately, and is not unusual throughout all the streets of the principal part of the capital. The pigs and dogs do the scavengering of these portions, although of these animals there is a great number. There is much fever there, and this owing to a superstition that prevailed in the late Queen's time that they were objectionable to the Queen. The water supply is very bad, and is generally understood at the capital that the present King has driven the idols and their keepers to the capital, and has put a stop to all of them at Tamatave, except those who are included in the prescribed list.

The fort, in the centre of which is the mission, is a number of English were established in the place during the reign of Queen Ravarola, is a circular earthwork, with a ditch and embankment, and a number of guns on the ramparts. The guns must be fired through embrasures cut opposite to an angle through both they can be fired in any direction. The fort is garrisoned by 200 men, and this is the principal duty of the soldiers. The garrison consists of a battalion of infantry, and a battalion of artillery, which, it called upon to carry a very weight or to go to great a distance in the mountains do their work be fired hailing from the fort. The soldiers are well armed, well drilled, and remarkably well, and very cheerfully, taking great care of their arms, and keeping them in good order. They sing, singly or together, and in joking and laughing; up or down hill appear to be all the same to them, no difference whatever in the rate of progression. Many of these men, for constantly carrying loads over their shoulders by means of a pole, with loads on each end, and, therefore, these men have high shoulders, which sometimes extend and meet round the back of the neck.

Twenty miles from Tamatave is a river, which, at certain times of the year is a landing-place about three miles above. The river is broad, and runs parallel to the coast for about an hour of from the sea, and then turns off abruptly to the from Hivondre. From this landing-place the road still continues along the coast, or else from Hivondre, by the mouth of the river, which is here of a narrow heavier sea than usual, and confusing thereby the waters collected from the whole country, and forms a place for the passage of canoes and boats to Andovoronte, about sixty miles. This old beach is now covered with beautiful cropped wood, and for the most part of the way by the river it is not visible, being concealed; and trees, and shrubs, and creepers are dotted about, giving the whole a most picturesque and delightful appearance. Some distance from

It is owing to the difficulty of discharging its waters into the sea that the great embankments are thrown up between the marshes and coast-line, and that so much dreaded Madagascar fever during the summer months, which in the interior is not known. The river is navigable for canoes and boats, though not good and healthy, and the Havas have the same dread of going down into the low country from here, that the Europeans have of remaining in it during the summer. The thermometer, in the early morning, at the capital, during the months of June and July, has been there, was as low as 50 degrees, while at Tamatave and Andovoronte there are a few wretched villages, about eight or ten miles apart, that have a considerable coasting trade, principally in rice, which is brought to them from the country inside, built similar to those at Tamatave, and far from being healthy, are not so much so as the capital, and are frequented by the Europeans, and especially by merchants, during the summer months, for the purpose of business, as it is exceedingly cold, raw, damp, and mainly. The land-journey from Tamatave to the capital is a long one, the effects of this by the violent manner in which they all commence coughing about the time they arrive at Tamatave, and continue coughing until the sun is fairly high. A rough-looking sedentary, would be driven into ecstasies. The average journey for travellers from Tamatave to the capital is six days. At every village there is a house for the use of travellers, which is generally larger, but not a bit better than those of the natives. These are, however, clean, and there is a table and chairs place on the floors or to hang round the walls, which give a clean and cheerful appearance; and there are generally two tables and chairs of this kind in the room

Alpes, lilac, or turquoise blue. All these velvets are very beautiful, as well as the striped qualities; yet many of the younger dames prefer the moires antiques, now brought to great perfection, and which, trimmed merely with passementerie or guipure laid on flatwise, produce a very dressy effect. Some of these moires are so thick and strong that the skirt is frequently left plain. When the stuff is very fine in quality the corsages are often made waistcoat fashion. Of ball dresses we need say nothing in this place, as we give below a description of the latest Parisian toilette de bal.

A new paletot in blue cloth or plush, with gold or silver button trimmings, is occasionally worn, and is somewhat coquet, but, although pretty and becoming to some persons, it must not be ventured upon for grand toilet, for which it is altogether unfitted. The much-favoured burnous continues to be worn for sortie de bal or for grand visite; and an elegant pardessus will be found described below in connection with our first Illustration.

The first month of the New Year brings no change with it in the form of bonnets, which continues as in our last. We may signalize those of blue velvet with white lace trimmings as very chaste and distingués, as are also the light-coloured crape bonnets, the latter better adapted for carriage wear.

We terminate our January notes by mentioning that violet cashmere stockings are de rigueur for a full walking costume: they have almost entirely superseded their rivals the plaids, which have nevertheless not hitherto been neglected.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Walking Dress. Robe of green-striped moire antique. The paletot is in dark brown velvet, trimmed at the bottom and round the edges of the sleeves with marten fur; the same description of fur is laid on in front and behind, so as to form a pelerine. Green velvet bonnet, ornamented above with a large rolling feather, and beneath with a tuft of feathers and velvet intermixed.

Fig. 2. Ball Dress.—The composition of this white ball dress appears at first sight rich and complicated, but in reality few are more simple. The robe may be either in tulle, tarlatan, or silk; two narrow gouffered trimmings are placed round the bottom of the skirt, surmounted by a narrow ruching. The remaining trimmings on the skirt, likewise gouffered, are put on in rows so as to form large vandykes edged with ruching. Narrow waistband, with bows and ends à l'Anglaise. The corsage is ornamented with two rows of gouffered and two rows of ruched trimming. Headdress of nasturtium flowers and leaves: pearl necklace.

Fig. 3. Evening Dress. Robe of dark violet moire, trimmed with bands of black velvet surmounted by a narrow guipure and passementerie. These bands are carried half way up the skirt, in the style shown in the Illustration. The sleeves are very narrow at the bottom, only opening to allow the hand to pass; the upturned manchette is provided with two rows of the dress-trimming, but finishes off with a linen cuff to match the little upright collar. Square pelerine, trimmed with velvet and guipure. Round corsage, with russia leather waistband.

Our millinery subjects in this day's Engraving consist of a charming headdress composed of black lace, with bouquets of rose-buds on the front, and a sleeve in tulle, with bouillonnés separated by light violet ribbons and wide Valenciennes lace edging.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1183.—VOL. XLII. SATURDAY, JANUARY 10, 1863. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

THE WEST INDIES, FREE LABOUR, AND COTTON.

EVER since the commencement of the cotton dearth, and, indeed, on more than one occasion anterior to it, certain gentlemen whose names we need not specify, but the authenticity and adequacy of whose information on the matter we propose submitting to the notice of our readers cannot be reasonably doubted, have done their utmost to direct the attention of the British public to the capabilities of the West Indian islands and mainland, and more particularly of Jamaica, for the culture and preparation of cotton for the European market. According to their testimony, it would be difficult to select within cotton-growing latitudes any other area of equal extent possessed of so many recommendations for the cultivation of the precious staple. It has been proved by actual experiment that the plant grown in the West Indies may, with ordinary care, be so reared as to exhibit all the superior qualities, and to command at Liverpool the best prices, of Sea Island cotton. It is notorious that in Jamaica and Guiana immense tracts of suitable land lie waste, partly in consequence of the ingrossing care devoted to the production of sugar, but chiefly to a lack of a sufficient number of labouring population. It is obvious that the position of the Antilles in relation to Europe is but little less favourable for the transport of merchandise than that of the Slave States of America. It is asserted that even now the labour requisite for cotton plantations can be secured at a rate of wages which would leave to all parties engaged in the culture and carriage of the article ample remuneration; but it is admitted that a large accession of hands would be required to enable the West Indies to develop, to anything like the extent of which it is capable and which the wants of Europe demand, a new cotton-growing interest which shall fully compensate for the loss of the old one.

Now, it happens that, to the powerful arguments urged in favour of any well-considered scheme for realising the above-named advantages, the course of events having its source in the American civil conflict furnishes a series of nearly equal cogency. It is well known that the fortune of war has placed in the hands of the Federal Government above 200,000 "contrabands,"—i.e., slaves who have either been captured by the invading troops or who have escaped from their Southern masters to the Federal camps. These coloured people have become a burden upon the hands of Mr. Lincoln, and a cause of serious perplexity to his Cabinet. What is to be done with them? There seem to be strong objections, physical as well as social, to using them as soldiers. To transport the whole of them to Liberia would require a respectable navy, and would entail upon the North an enormous expense. The jealousy of the Free States against allowing negro labour to come into competition with the labour of whites is too strong and active to admit of a gradual absorption of the African element into the industrial population. Meanwhile, they have to be fed and sheltered at the public expense. During the continuance of the war, it is true, a large number of "contrabands" may be employed in the construction of military works and in performing the duties of the more menial camp offices. But their number is constantly on the increase; and what shall be done with them when the present struggle has ceased is a problem which the lapse of every month renders at the same time more pressing and more difficult of solution.

Here, then, we have two conditions which, whenever they can be united, will realise a consummation equally advantageous to us, to our West Indian colonies, to the Federal Government and people of America, to the captured and liberated negroes, and to the cause of humanity. There is a real waiting for labourers, and there are labourers waiting for a real. They are not far distant from each other. The negroes themselves appear willing enough to go, for the great success of the black emigrants to the Northern States of Hayti has proved that in this instance deportation has no necessary connection with misery. The authorities and planters of the West Indian Islands are not only willing but eager to receive them, and to give such reasonable security as may be demanded for respecting their personal freedom and giving them profitable employment. The Government at Washington, on such securities being entered into, will not only let the coloured labourers depart, but will themselves convey, or be at the expense of conveying, them to their new home. Mr. Adams, the American Ambassador to the Court of St. James's, has broached this question to Earl Russell, her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and has intimated the readiness of the Federal Government to enter into a convention with that of the United Kingdom for the removal, to any of the West Indian colonies, of the blacks in America to whom the present war has given or may give liberty.

Where, then, is the obstacle, and of what kind is it, that a proposal which meets the wishes of so many parties is not forthwith carried into effect? From the tenour of a despatch forwarded by the Duke of Newcastle to the Lieutenant-Governor of Jamaica it appears that the British Government are not prepared to enter into such a convention as that suggested by Mr. Adams; and, from the published diplomatic correspondence of the American Ambassador, it seems that our Cabinet, after discussing the subject with fitting seriousness, came to the conclusion that, "on the whole, it might be the means of entangling them in some way or other with the hostilities in the United States, by possible reclamations of fugitives, or in some other way—a danger which they were most desirous to avoid." However much the decision is to be regretted, the evident anxiety of the British Government to avoid furnishing a pretext of quarrel to either of the belligerents in America will command the approval of the English public. How far the offensive action should be carried is a question not very easy to be determined; and perhaps it is better that those who are responsible for the maintenance of international amity should err on the side of apprehension rather than of recklessness. But, supposing the reason assigned by Earl Russell for declining the offer of Mr. Seward to be the true reason that exists, it is a fair question for consideration whether our Government are not abnegating national rights, or, at any rate, abstaining from the exercise of them, beyond the limits imposed by the exigences of the situation: and whether, on the ground of what we now refuse to do, mediation may not be at an end hereafter which we shall certainly resist, even at the cost of war.

It is matter of notoriety, besides being in strict accordance with international law, that, as opportunity occurs, we make valid contracts, whether of purchase or of sale, with both the parties to the civil war. The tobacco, the rice, or the cotton which may be shipped in the small quantities, through the North, are just as likely to have been the property of Confederate planters, and to have changed hands by other than commercial means during the war, as are the fugitive negroes. On the Constitutional principles of the Southern States these now homeless "contrabands" are in precisely the same position with regard to the outer world as any other articles of property would be which the chances of war had transferred from its former owner to its present possessor. No nation can pretend, at the close of a contest with some other nation, that it has a right to reclaim from those who were neutrals in the hostilities and "innocent purchasers" the citizens may have been deprived by military force, and which have thereby found their way into the hands of a third party. Besides, we do not in this country recognise the right of property in man. Should any one of the African labourers whom our Government declines to receive in the West Indies, with the double consent of the Federal Cabinet and of the wretched captives themselves, have found his way to any part of her Majesty's dominions, even before the period of the Secession, he would thereupon have become a free man, and we should have refused the rendition of him to any Power on earth, under any risk of consequences. We did so but recently in the case of John Anderson, who had taken refuge in Canada; and, unquestionably, we shall do so again and again whenever and by whomsoever reclamation is made upon us for fugitive slaves. We trust her Majesty's Government have not, in the excess of their caution, laid ground for the urging of some such demand upon us when the war shall have ceased. We should be sorry that an inference could be justly drawn from any decision of theirs to the effect that the British Government recognise the doctrine that slaves are property which may be reclaimed, as such, by one Power from another. We should arrogate to ourselves no opinion upon an idea of our own national creed in this matter for the sake of showing our delicate impartiality, does not strike us as dictated by a far-seeing wisdom. And if, on any question affecting international relations, no decision can be wholly free from risk, it does appear to us that a convention with the Federal authorities for the effectuation of an object so desirable to all parties and in all senses as the one proposed should not have been refused, lest at some time hereafter we may be asked by an irritated nation to do what we never have done and never shall do.

The question will be sure to come up in other shapes before long, and will probably be determined by Parliamentary authority. The last advices from Jamaica inform us that notice of motion had been given in the Assembly of that island for the appointment of a committee to consider the best means of promoting the immigration of the coloured and black people of the States. Our own Legislature can hardly evade, or wish to evade, so important a question. The operatives of Lancashire who are now subsisting, not without a bitter pang, on public charity, magnanimously scorned to lessen their own distress by giving their sanction to the continuance of negro slavery. If, then, their prospects can be brightened, and the staple of their manufacture largely increased, by a process which, so far as it goes, will convert slaves into free men, we cannot but think that they have a genuine claim upon the consideration of their countrymen. Are we entitled to shut them out from the most promising advantages which have hitherto been offered them, lest, by acting upon right principles, we may hereafter be called to account by a Government founded upon wrong principles? Of course, we take for granted that, should Parliament show a disposition to assume the responsibility of accepting Mr. Seward's offer, the Ministers are ready to recommend rejection to it. To the arrangement itself, whereby the negroes captured by Northern arms may, with their own consent, be sent across to the West Indies, they can offer no opposition but that which arises out of apprehension for the future; but if the country is resolved to face the risk of war with the yet unrecognised Confederacy, on grounds which it can fully justify and be proud of, the Government, we cannot doubt, will cordially concur in its decision.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Patrie of the 3rd inst. says that the Emperor and Queen Victoria exchanged New-Year's congratulations through the telegraph.

An account of the great State reception at the Tuileries on New Year's Day is contained in the Moniteur of the 2nd inst. After receiving the members of the Imperial family, the chief officers of the household, the superior clergy, the Ministers, the members of the Privy Council, and a few more privileged persons, the Emperor and Empress attended mass in the Hall de Pieces, by the Bishop, who drew to their apartments. At one o'clock the members of the Diplomatic Corps were received in the Hall de Pieces by the Emperor, the Papal Nuncio addressing his Majesty in their name to the following effect :—

Sire,—The members of the Diplomatic Corps beg your Majesty to accept the respectful homage which I have the honour to offer you in their name on the occasion of the New Year. We are delighted, Sire, whenever we have an opportunity of congratulating the Emperor on the prosperity of your Majesty, for that of your august family, and for the prosperity of France.

To the above address the Emperor replied in these words :—

The sentiments that you express in the name of the Diplomatic Corps deeply move me. I am happy to see myself surrounded by the representatives of all the Powers with which France is at peace, and I thank them for the wish to testify to my desire to maintain with them those friendly relations which are the essential basis of international law.

The members of the Diplomatic Corps then withdrew, and the general receptions afterwards took place. When receiving the clergy the Emperor observed to the new archbishop of the Archdiocese of Paris, adding, that the deceased Prelate had left him an example of moderation and firmness which his successor would do well to follow. The Moniteur publishes a long list of promotions and nominations in the Legion of Honour made on the occasion of New-Year's Day. There are 3 promotions to the rank of Commander, 24 to that of Officer, and 386 nominations to that of Knight. Another decree confers 1000 military medals.

The Emperor left the Tuileries on the 15th inst. to shoot in the forest of St. Germain. Marshal Randon, General Fleury, M. Rouland, M. Rouher, and M. Billault, Minister of the Interior, were invited to partake in the sport.

M. Lambert, consul of the King of Madagascar, has returned to Paris.

The funeral of Cardinal Morlot, the late Archbishop of Paris, took place on the 8th inst. All the Ministers, the members of the Privy Council, the presidents of the great bodies of the State, and the French ecclesiastical chiefs, were present at the ceremony.

In pursuance of the orders of the French Emperor a stone pillar, two metres high, in the form of a Roman milestone, is being sculptured at Laon, to be erected in the centre of Cæsar's camp at Mundump. The design and inscription are furnished by the Emperor in person.

According to La Presse, a reinforcement of 4600 men has been sent to the French army in Mexico.

At the last sitting of the French Academy, M. Nisard was appointed Director, and M. de Sacy Chancellor, for the first quarter of the present year.

At the Louvre a number of paintings are being packed up for removal, having been presented by the Emperor to various museums in the departments.

The reconstruction of the Pon de l'Archevêché, in Paris, is about to be commenced, at an expense to the city of 1,200,000 francs. The bridge, commenced in 1828, was opened on the 6th of November of the same year.

SPAIN.

The resignation of General Concha as Ambassador at the Court of the Tuileries has been accepted by the Queen. The Duke de Valmy, at the same time, declares herself quite satisfied with the zeal, intelligence, and loyalty displayed by the Marquis in his ministerial functions. The Correspondencia Autografa says that the present relations between France and Spain offer no danger of any disturbance.

The Madrid journals of the 27th inst. announce that all the resignations recently tendered have been accepted by the Government. The resignations agitate both the Conservative and Liberal parties.

In the Chamber of Deputies, on the 2nd inst., Senor Mazarredo most strongly appealed to the Finance Minister not to arrange the settlement of the Spanish coupon before England, as he had delivered up Gibraltar to Spain. Senor Salaverria stated in reply that the Government was not about to propose the settlement of the English coupons.

It is alleged that Marshal O'Donnell is determined to dissolve the Congress should any one be opposed, and to stake the tenure of his office on the result of a general election.

For the first time a general statistic review of the movement of the population in Spain has been published. According to this the number of births in the past year was 571,885 ; of deaths, 432,057 ; of marriages, 124,000. The statistics, published in the "Gaceta General de Estadistica," singularly enough, fail to give the total of the population. It is only recorded that there were 37 suicidists, one death in 33, one marriage in 129 ; according to which the total of inhabitants would be 15,500,000.

HOLLAND.

A Ministerial crisis has occured in Holland, the Colonial Minister having resigned, in consequence of an adverse vote of the Lower Chamber, rejecting his proposal to increase the emoluments of officers of European planters in Java. The King has accepted his resignation, and the Finance Minister has been provisionally intrusted with the Colonial portfolio.

AUSTRIA.

The Austrian Cabinet has, it appears, been issuing a circular despatch in reference to the Greek throne, the point of which is that it would be inconsistent in Europe if an Italian Prince were to become the Sovereign of the new kingdom.

The Vienna Gazette announces several important promotions in the army. General of Division de Schmerling quits the post of Under-Secretary of State of the War Department to take the command of the 7th division of the army of Italy, in the place of Prince Alexander of Hesse, placed on the Retired List at his own request. General of Division Baron Mertens becomes Under-Secretary of the Ministry of War. Five Colonels and Brigadiers are promoted to the rank of Major-General, and five Lieutenant-Colonels become Colonels; which promotions, in their turn, give rise to others of an inferior order.

TURKEY.

An "administrative deadlock," as the diplomatists term it, has occurred at Constantinople. Fuad Pacha, the Grand Vizier ; Aali Pacha, Minister for Foreign Affairs ; and Kiamil Pacha, President of the Council of State, have tendered their resignations. It is expected that either Kipriali Pacha or Namick Pacha will be appointed Grand Vizier. Mehemet Ali, the Capitan Pacha (Minister of Marine), has been dismissed ; and Mehemet Bey, now in London, has been appointed his successor. Ruchdi Pacha, Serasker (Minister of War) has been dismissed, and is to be succeeded by Rachid Pacha. Halil Pacha has been nominated Grand Master of the Artillery.

GREECE.

The Gazette of the 6th inst. contains a memorandum which is the first authentic declaration of her Majesty's Government on the subject of the cession of the Ionian Islands. The document is that which the Hon. Mr. Elliott was instructed to deliver to the President of the Provisional Government of Greece on his arrival in that country. It sets forth that England has always had a deep interest in the welfare and prosperity of Greece, and cites the treaties of 1827 and 1832 as evidence. Passing then from generals to particulars, the document promises that if Greece shall elect a sovereign acceptable to the Queen and entirely independent of action against Turkey, her Majesty will propose to the Senate and Representatives of the Ionian Islands her desire that they should unite themselves with Greece ; and if they are of the same mind the Queen will then take steps to obtain the concurrence of the other Powers to that arrangement. But if Greece chooses a Prince who shall be the symbol of revolution and aggression her Majesty will refuse to relinquish her protectorate. On the other hand, a constitutional Prince will be honoured with the friendship and confidence of the Queen.

AMERICA.

By the arrival of the steamer Norwegian we are in receipt of Boston and New York journals of the 27th ult.

WAR NEWS.

The army of the Potomac, though for the moment inactive, will not, it is said, under its present commander, be suffered to go into winter quarters.

General Burnside has published a further report, in which he accepts the whole responsibility of the reverse at Fredericksburg and exonerates the President, General Halleck, and Secretary Stanton from all blame. He attributes the defeat to the fog and the delay in building the bridges across the Rappahannock, which gave the Confederates twenty-four hours more to concentrate their forces in their strong position.

The number of wounded on the side of the Federals is finally given, on the authority of the medical director, to be 7000 instead of 9000, as previously reported.

The committee appointed by the Senate to inquire into the disaster at Fredericksburg have presented their report. They examined Generals Burnside, Hooker, and Franklin, and have presented the evidence without comment. The Generals agreed that the delay in the arrival of the pontoons, which, yet it has been found impossible to discover the guilty party, as General Halleck considers his responsibility terminated with the order for their despatch immediately after the receipt of the request. General Burnside denied that the troops were demoralised ; but General Sumner thought his were, and that the army was disorganised.

The report that General Foster had been defeated in North Carolina was inaccurate. He had encountered the enemy, driven and captured Goldsborough, where he tore up the line of railroad connecting Wilmington with Richmond, and then retired to Newbern. He fought four successful engagements, with a loss of about 600 men. En revanche he captured 500 prisoners and eleven pieces of artillery, with a large number of small arms.

General Banks's expedition has been sighted in the Gulf of Mexico. It is confirmed that he will supersede General Butler in the command of the south-west department.

The Confederates have recaptured Holly Springs, Mississipi. The Federals lost in that affair 500 killed and wounded and 150 prisoners, also 500,000 dols. worth of stores.

President Davis has issued a proclamation retaliatory upon Butler. He and all his officers are to be hung if found in arms, but the negroes to be paroled. Negroes taken in arms and their officers are also to be hung.

A large steamer, bringing a heavy stock of shoes, blankets, and cloth for the Confederate Government, got safely into Charleston Harbour recently.

General Beuham has been appointed Confederate Governor South Carolina, in place of Governor Pickens, killed.

WASHINGTON

A full account of the interview between the President and the caucus of Republican senators, who passed a vote of want of confidence in a part of the Ministry, is published. It appears that the President heard what the senators had to say, and then respectfully declined to accede to their request, on the ground that what the country needed was military success, and that his generals, and others, "even were they angels," could not guarantee that. The resolution was principally directed against Mr. Seward, on account of his conservatism in home politics and his irritating attitude in the management of foreign affairs. The latter ground was urged by Senator Sumner, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. In consequence of the refusal of the President to accept the resignations of Messrs. Seward and Chase, these gentlemen continue to hold office. This is the first attempt in the course of American Constitutional history to make the personnel of the Administration dependent on Congress. It has failed in the present instance.

The President hesitates to sign the bill admitting Western Virginia as a separate State.

The efforts of the representatives of the Border State men to induce the President to cancel his proclamation of the 22nd of September have been futile, but he has taken a favourable view of their petition that Tennessee and portions of Eastern Virginia, where manifestations of loyalty have been made, be exempted from its operation.

Congress, by a vote of 77 against 33, has given leave to report a bill appropriating 20,000,000 dols. to Missouri to aid her in emancipating her slaves.

A bill embodying Secretary Chase's proposals for raising 300,000,000 dols. for the service of the currency and 600,000,000 dols. for the service of the next fiscal year, has been introduced into the House of Representatives.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Mr. Harriet Beecher Stowe has published in the current number of the Atlantic Monthly a reply to the appeal made by the women of America by the women of Britain on the subject of slavery ten years ago. She says that those who felt the weight of that appeal have had hitherto no leisure to reply to it :—

All their time and energies were already absorbed in direct efforts to remove the great evil concerning which the call of their sisters of other lands had been newly aroused, and their only answer was the silent continuance of those efforts. It came to pass, however, when other anti-slavery pages has been turned in the anti-slavery history of America that the women of our country, during the great anti-slavery revival in which their English sisters exhorted them to utmost done, step properly and naturally feel moved to reply to their appeal, and lay before them the history of what has occurred since the receipt of that affectionate and Christian address.

After giving her version of the anti-slavery contest in the United States during the past ten years, she charges England with sympathy with a leaning in favour of the establishment of a slaveholding Confederacy, the sympathy of the women of England she scouts :—

And now, sisters of England, think it not strange if we bring back the words of your letter, not in bitterness but in deepest sadness, and lay them at your door. We say to you,—Sisters, you have spoken well ; we have heard you ; we have healed ; we have striven in the cause, even unto death. We have called our devotion by desolate hearth and darkened homestead,—by the blood of sons, husbands, and brothers. In many of our dwellings the very light of our lives has gone out, and yet we accept the life-long darkness as our own part in this great and awful expiation, by which the bonds of wickedness shall be loosed, and shaking peace established on the foundation of righteousness. Sisters, what have you done, and what do you mean to do? In view of the decline of the noble anti-slavery fire in England—in view of all the facts and admissions recited from your own papers—we beg leave, in solemn sadness, to return to you your own words.

The reply is signed by Mrs. Stowe "in behalf of many thousands of American women."

Orders for the supply of the French army in Mexico continue to be executed in New York. The Mexican Minister has protested, but Mr. Seward declines to interfere.

Thirty-nine out of the 300 Sioux Indians imprisoned at Dakota, Minnesota, were to be hung on the 27th for their complicity with the massacre of the whites, and fears are entertained that the whites will "lynch" the rest. The colonel commanding the post has invoked the aid of the law-abiding portion of the citizens.

CALIFORNIA.

The British steamer Scotland has arrived at San Francisco from Hong-Kong, Shanghai, and Yokohama. The Scotland is the property of the Pacific Mail Line of steamers which are to make a monthly trip between San Francisco, Japan, and China. The charge for freight is 12 dols. a ton, and for passengers 250 dols. each. The Scotland brought 700 tons of freight from China, and 300 tons from Japan, principally teas.

A serious collision took place on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway on the 5th inst., between the 10.30 train from Manchester to Leeds and the other from Leeds—approached the junction at the same time, when the latter train run into the other. Several passengers were seriously hurt, and some it is feared fatally.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the 5th inst., lectured to a large audience in the Manchester National Public Hall, under the auspices of the Literary and Scientific Institution of the village. The subject was "Free Trade," and the lecturer was received with loud applause. Lordship's installation as Lord Rector of Glasgow University.—Lord Palmerston has promised to attend a banquet at Edinburgh also during the Easter holidays.

The annual drawing for the prizes of the Manchester Art-Union (which was established in connection with the late Mr. Alexander Heywood, Esq.) presiding. Mr. R. Aspden, the secretary, said that 10,416 tickets had been sold, being an increase of upwards of 1000 on the year. In June, but considerably below the number disposed of for the drawing in January, 1861.

The Rev. Joseph Wood, of Clayton-le-Moors, near Blackburn, is in custody, charged with forgery. He was the president of a local friendly society, and had, it is alleged, forged the name of the secretary to various cheques for the Reduction of the National Debt. He subsequently produced the balance-sheet, showing a large amount invested in the funds. He has a new spasm, on his own acknowledgment, that he sent only £200, and forged the receipt for £1000.

A poor woman, named Keene, and her six children, all under seven years of age, were burned to death in their house in Bow, on the 3rd inst. Her husband were having supper with some friends when they discovered that the house was on fire. They both rushed out of the room, fastening the door after them, and went to the house for a little while, and then jumped out of the window, as did a lodger, after throwing out her child, which was safely caught by the bystanders.

The tenth annual meeting of the Romsey Labourers Encouragement Society was held on the 7th inst., when the prizes awarded by it to deserving labourers were distributed by Lord Palmerston. The Marquis of Lansdowne and Lord Carnarvon also addressed the meeting. of the system of giving such awards, and exhorted the labourers to be steady and persevering in their habits. Lord Palmerston and Lord Lansdowne presided at the dinner which afterwards took place, but he was obliged to delay his visit to the Isle of Wight for a few days in consequence.

A ball in aid of the Great Western Railway Widows and Orphans' Fund was held in the Townhall, Oxford, on the 5th inst., under the patronage of the Lord Mayor and Corporation of the city and the directors of the Great Western Railway, the latter having, as is their usual custom, granted special trains for the accommodation of visitors. The ball was well conducted with it and their friends, to the number of between 500 and 600, to and from the various stations on the line between Swindon and Oxford. The proceeds of the fund were received in the course of the evening, amongst which was one of £10 from the Earl of Macclesfield.

A county meeting was held on the 3rd inst. at Cambridge, on the subject of the Lancashire distress. The High Sheriff presided, and the Duke of Richmond, Lord Hardwicke, and Lord Hatherley were present. The efforts made by the manufacturers to meet it, and the prospect there was that they had overcome the difficulties of the crisis, were the chief topics of the meeting. It would ecne out of this calamity stronger than ever in the eyes of foreign nations, which would not have the power to compete with it. Lord Hatherley, in shewing that the country possessed an amount of strength, charity, and material resources which was the envy of foreign countries, said that at the meeting was a very interesting one, and £1000 was subscribed in the room.

A curious discussion took place at the Quarter Sessions held at Oxford on the 5th inst. Sergeant Pulling and Lord Eustace were disputing the guns captured at Sebastopol, the Mayor of Oxford applied that a gun should be sent to that city. The application was refused, and the Town Council refused to go to the expense of mounting the piece, which were accordingly offered to them. The Rev. Mr. "City Bull-dog" Gregory then got up for the purpose of removing the "trophies" from their ignominious position, and the Mayor, Mr. Ruscombe Poole, and Alderman Hall were said to be mounted in front of the County Hall. At the meeting of magistrates on the 6th, however, the matter was set at rest, Alderman Hall having "succumbed to bygone," and in favour of abstaining from anything which might offend the susceptibilities of the Russian Government. The application for a gun was refused.

At the monthly meeting of the Council of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce on the 5th inst. Captain Brown, of the British ship Lexington, was presented with a gold chronometer watch and other medals for the officers of his ship, the medals having been forwarded for presentation by the Secretary of State. Mr. Brancker, in moving a resolution, in making the presentation, stated that Captain Brown rescued thirty-five men—fifteen of whom were rescued by the Lexington, and the remainder were taken from the burning ship by the Lexington's boats. The Captain held on to the ship until he was compelled by the crew to reach land or to float about until some ship came in sight. Captain Brown incurred considerable risk in launching his own boats in the storm.

A fire broke out on the morning of the 6th inst. in an isolated block of buildings at Plymouth, consisting of an hotel, assembly-rooms, theatre, &c. The site occupies more than an acre of ground, and the buildings were erected by the corporation, at a cost of £60,000, in the Compo-Classic style, in 1813. The fire commenced shortly after midnight in the property of the Theatre Royal, and the interior of the latter was completely gutted. The flames communicated by the roof with the card and club rooms of the Royal Hotel, both of which are gutted. The ballroom staircase is burnt. The handsome assembly-room and the tearoom below is are also destroyed. The eastern end of the quadrangle is uninjured, and Mr. Pearse, the lessee of the hotel, is replacing his furniture. All parties are insured except the manager of the theatre, who has recently spent £3000 in dresses and decorations.

The tenth annual report of the directors of the Dover Sailors' Home has just appeared, and is eminently satisfactory. The financial statement shows a balance on the right side of the account. A letter has been received from the French Minister of Marine and the Colonies returning his thanks for services that have been rendered to the crews of thirty-five French shipwrecked vessels. The commissioners for the valuation of rendered charities have made favourable mention of the management and condition of the home. During the past year 1000 persons have been fewer sheltered at Dover than usual; but since the foundation of the House the crews of 138 vessels have received relief in it. The establishment is now in a most prosperous condition, not by seafaring folks alone, but by soldiers of the garrison; and a smoking-room, which was opened in 1859 in view to weaning from the public-house, has been the resort of a large number of steady young sailors. Admission to these rooms is gratuitous. In the year of the institution it placed a large mahtine barometer, with printed instructions; and there is also a chart for studying—from the use of which Scotchmen fishermen, coasters, and seafaring people generally; while a complete series of sailing-charts of the Channel and British coast, with the latest Admiralty surveys, may be consulted at the Home.

The Great Northern Railway have just opened a new passenger-station at Troopdeal, forty miles from London. The South-Eastern Railway Company propose, at an estimated expense of £190,000, to improve their railway and harbour communication between the main line and the Continent at Folkestone by a short line from Cheriton to the western platform of the harbour station. The new station at the junction between Harnpstead and Margate Railways, combined with a widening and improving of the Margate branch line. The company will also borrow a further sum of £47,000.—Stoke's Bay Railway, which was begun about five years ago, is completed. It is the nearest point both to the Needles and to the Isle of Wight, and is a branch of the South-Western system. On the 5th inst., Captain Tyler, the Government inspector of Railways, made the usual inspection of the line preparatory to its opening, when it was found to be in a satisfactory condition.—The site decided on for the construction of the new docks at Milford Haven is open or near the estuary known as Neyland Pill, at its junction with the Milford Haven River. The Milford Docks Railway Company, of New Milford, at Burton, in Pembrokeshire, with branch railways thereto, and to the docks and pier at Neyland, incorporated last session, powers will be taken to adopt both the broad and narrow gauge. The estimated expense of the docks is £190,000, and of the railways £30,000.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The Prince of Wales has accepted the freedom of the Merchant Taylors' Company.

The Lady Mayoress has issued invitations to a juvenile ball in the Mansion House on the evening of Twelfth-night.

Two assistants at a druggist's in New Cavendish-street were accidentally poisoned last week from drinking beer in which strychnine had been mixed. One died immediately, and the other is not expected to live.

At the last meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works it was stated that the expenditure of the board in 1863 would, it was estimated, amount to £2,192,097 13s. 6d. In the course of the year, however, considerable progress is being made with the main-drainage works.

The Lord Mayor says that arrangements are in progress for carrying out the intentions of Mr. Peabody in his munificent gift to the poor of London have visited various localities recommended for improved dwellings. Plans have been drawn and contracts are in progress.

The children of the Lamb and Flag Ragged Schools at Clerkenwell sat down on the 5th inst. to the number of 150, on a meal, comprising 41lb. of roast beef, 4½wt. of potatoes, and 28 plum-puddings, with other good fare. Each child on departure was presented with a penny by Miss Bodkin, daughter of the Assistant Judge of the Middlesex Sessions.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has become the president of St. Ann's Society; and the Archbishop of York and the Bishop of Ely, vice-presidents, have promised to preside at the next annual distribution of prizes to the boys and girls connected with the Royal Asylum of St. Ann's Society, at Redcross-street, Cripplegate, on the 13th inst. Mr. Alderman Sir Robert Carden will take the chair at the festival.

The Danish church in Wellclose-square, originally built during the reign of Queen Anne, chiefly for the sailors belonging to Danish ships in the docks, but in which Divine service has been held since 1827, was reopened on the 1st inst. by the Rev. Erik Magnusson, of Riskaring, Dalecarlia, Sweden, the Rev. Mr. Lundgren, of Gothenburg, and Mr. Grönvall (trustees of the church), and a large number of the Danes and Scandinavians resident in London, foreign visitors and sailors from their ships, attended. It is intended to continue these services every Sunday.

On the evening of New-Year's Day a testimonial from the Institute of Architects, consisting of Mr. Tite, M.P., president; Professor Donaldson, vice-president; and Professor Kerr, waited upon Mr. Cockerell at his residence, and presented him with a very elegant silver-gilt testimonial of valium pages by Mr. Owen Jones. The address was voted to Mr. Cockerell on his retirement from the office of professor of the institute. A portrait of Mr. Cockerell has also been painted by Mr. Boxall, A.R.A., and will soon be placed in the rooms of the Institute.

The Chaplain of the Middlesex Hospital announces the following as the result of a collection performed in the hospital on the 6th inst.: A lady hereabove quite a stranger to us, asked permission to visit the wards. The request being complied with, she visited the sick, and by her kind words and gracious manner, presented half a sovereign to almost every one of our poor people. The sum of £5 10s. was a thank-offering to Almighty God for restoring herself from a dangerous illness. The number of our patients amounts to nearly 500.

The past week has births of 2146 children—1099 boys and 1047 girls—were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1853-62 the average number was 1960. In 1862 it was 2018.—The deaths of London registered in the week that ended last Saturday exhibit an increase on the number of the previous week. In the ten years 1853-62 the average number of deaths derived from the returns of the first week of the year in ten years—1853-62—was 1,010. In the week ending Jan. 3, 1863, the number was 1,172. Five nonagenarians died in the week. The two oldest were a man and a woman, aged severally ninety-four years.

THE DISTRESS IN THE NORTH.

THE executive committee held its usual weekly meeting on the 8th inst., at the Manchester Townhall. The Mayor occupied the chair, and most of the members of the committee were present. The total receipts of the week were reported to be £3,000, and the total fund had been £37 below that sum out. In a note dated the Palace, Armagh, Jan. 5, the Archbishop of Armagh incloses a bank-note for £100, and requests that collections may be made in churches in the diocese of Armagh and Clogher. The committee made grants to various districts, amounting in all to £2,000 in all.

From a return compiled by Mr. Maclure, the secretary of the Central Committee, taken in connection with the Registrar-General's report, it appears that there are 494,984 persons now receiving relief from the rates or voluntary subscriptions in the cotton districts. Of these there are the entire support of 78,893; the relief committees provide for 274,078; and 181,973 receive assistance from both sources. The total weekly cost of the out-door relief committees is £16,681; and the guardians are distributing outdoor relief to the amount of £5,000 a week. Besides 181,973 receive supplementary aid from the charitable funds. These returns comprise a population of 629,876 workpeople. The total weekly expenditure, therefore, by the relief committees, guardians, amounts to £46,000 odd—making, with the poor-law expenditure, an aggregate sum of £64,000 odd. The total amount received in meeting the distress is £1,000,000 sterling, throughout these districts.

A letter has been received from Messrs. Thomas Fielden and William S. Stell, of Todmorden, Mr. Frank Crossley, M.P., from the New York Lancashire Relief Committee, upholding their intention to distribute the supplies of provisions which are to be sent by the George Griswold and other vessels. The Treasurer has authorised the collector of Customs at Liverpool to remit the duties on the articles sent out by the United States for the relief of distress in the cotton manufacturing districts.

The Mansion House Committee met on the 2nd inst. The total amount received up to the previous night was reported to be £193,843, of which £18,317 had been received during the week. The total amount applied for in the course of the grants made on the 2nd inst., was £252,159 8s. 6d. The committee were occupied a greater part of the day in hearing deputations from various districts, and grants to the amount of £19,077 were made. In the course of Monday and Tuesday next the remaining grants will be made up by representatives from India—viz.: £10,000 from Bombay, and £4000 from Calcutta, being a further instalment, making a total of £14,000. The Madras contribution has also been received from Mr. Peabody.

At a meeting of the general committee for managing the Indian Famine Relief Fund was held on the 2nd inst. at the Mansion House—the Lord Mayor in the chair—to consider the proposal made in a recent letter from the Governor-General of India to send back the surplus fund subscribed in England for the Indian famine a year or two ago, for the benefit of the Lancashire Fund. A smart discussion arose on the question whether other charitable objects should have a share in the money. Some gentlemen urged that the distress in Coventry and Nuneaton was great enough to warrant an appropriation of a portion of the money in that quarter, and others argued for the London charities, now suffering to some extent from the all-absorbing claims of Lancashire; but the general feeling was that the money should be adopted; and a resolution was therefore agreed to that the whole fund should go to Lancashire.

PROSPECTUS.

The want of a first-class Hotel at Cannes has long been felt by every one who has visited the locality; the deficiency of accommodation being such as to compel large numbers of visitors to seek lodgings in private houses.

This Company is formed to supply that want by the erection of a large Hotel and "Pension," with Baths and other requisite appendages, on a site which has been secured on favourable terms, and which combines all the advantages of a residence for visiting and patients during the winter periods of the year, in this charming locality.

The Grand Hotel de la Mediterranee is now open with thirty-five suites of Rooms, and the remaining portion will be completed very shortly; Cannes will then be provided with a first-class Hotel.

The most suitable site in the neighbourhood, containing about six English acres, has been secured by the Company, on favourable terms, for the above purpose, and the Building Contract has been entered into with Messrs. Gaudin and Son, the principal contractors at Cannes, and the immediate vicinity of the chateau of Lord Brougham, and of the Prince and Princess Troubetzkoy, and is within a few minutes' walk of the Railway Station of the Duc de Vallombrosa. It will be within a few minutes' walk of the railway station, and will command a view of the Bay of Cannes and the Esterel Mountains, and will be open to the sea-breezes from the south, and sheltered from the north winds.

To meet a generally expressed wish, and for the convenience of Shareholders residing abroad, the Directors have resolved to issue Shares to bearer, payable at the issue of Scrip Certificates to bearer. Persons holding Scrip will be in the same position and enjoy the same privileges as Shareholders whose names are entered on the Register.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Shares may be obtained of the Brokers and Officers of the Company.

ness to declare himself solely responsible for the movements which ended in the carnage of Fredericksburg. But the people are not to be deceived by any such transparent advice. It may be perfectly true that the final arrangements for the attack were the General's own; they could hardly be otherwise; but it is notorious that the advance itself was a political as much as a military movement, and was a necessity of party. This is the fatal truth; and in the fact that, in order to meet the exigencies of party, as understood in America, it is permitted to slaughter 10,000 men, is or should be the death-sentence of the present system. It was well known that the attack could be successful only by a miracle, and M'Clellan had preferred to sacrifice his own position as head of the army rather than hurl it upon almost certain destruction. But the party found a General who owned himself no great master of war, and who did not hesitate to rush upon the Confederate intrenchments in a way that proved that he had not under-estimated his own professional ignorance. He was not even supplied with the means of making his mad attack in the best way; his pontoons were "forgotten;" and the whole chapter, from the beginning to the end, was one of misfortune. Still, and here is the most lamentable thing of all, the politicians of the North do not appear to consider that anything discreditable has been done. They are staggered by the magnitude of the slaughter which a party move has caused, but they are unable to see that such a step was one of guilt, or that the conduct of a campaign should be dictated by military considerations rather than by the unscrupulous will of a faction. It is difficult for English readers to realise this state of things. Perhaps they may form a very rough idea of it by supposing that we are at war with France; that a French army lies in a very strong position near Boulogne; that the Government, say Lord Palmerston, very unpopular, publicly proclaim not good, and that Mr. Disraeli's friends have been winning a great many elections, and threaten a crisis. At this moment, and desirous to please the people by a sign of vigour, Lord Palmerston and the War Secretary intimate to Lord Clyde that at all hazards he must attack the French. Lord Clyde obeys, and leads the army into a position of fire, where, throughout a whole day, our men are mowed down by artillery against which he can do nothing. At night he retreats, leaving ten thousand soldiers on the field; but Lord Palmerston has asserted his reputation for being in earnest, and Mr. Disraeli does not give notice of a vote of want of confidence. That is not a parallel case, but it is sufficiently like what has occurred to make an English reader indignant that such a state of things can be held compatible with Christian civilisation.

This fourth defeat of the North is no doubt very important, but it is not one which adds much to the glory of the South. The day could not have gone otherwise than as it did, and the Confederates had nearly as little to do as the madmen which delivered over the troops of the North to such inevitable destruction. The Confederates had really little to do but to serve their guns, and this they did admirably. Such part of the affair as partook of the nature of a battle did no discredit to either side, and Jackson himself, with either forced luck, or chose to retreat for a considerable distance. We do not believe the majority of the stories that impute bad fighting to the Northerners. If they fought badly at all it was because they were badly led; and the murderous system—there is no other word for it—of intrusting important movements to officers who have never been selected for their military skill or education, is responsible for anything like disgrace that may have attached to any of the regiments. The individual American fights excellently while he can depend upon himself: but the moment he is asked for the soldier's faith in his officer he is helpless, for he is in a land where reason forbids it, and where in this the officer will probably lend him to be knocked on the head to no good purpose. Then, very likely, the American walks away or runs away; but it is sheer insolence to call this cowardice. Give him officers, and teach him to obey them unhesitatingly, and the chronicle of this war will tell another story.

But it is the system which is the curse of the Republic, in the field and out of it. There is no such thing as political conscience; and the soldiers are as much made the counters in the game as they ever were in the old monarchical wars of Europe, against which so many well-deserved taunts used to be launched by popular writers. Only, upon the old kingly cross the Republican has engrafted a new species of cut-and-thrust. The Kings sent their men to the battle, but it was at least under commanders who knew their business, and who did not throw away life unnecessarily except under circumstances of a very peculiar description. Generals were sometimes accused of not utterly defeating an enemy because it was highly desirable that he should be left strong enough to ensure another year's campaign; but when they fought him they did so in a rational manner, had an object in view, and either gained it or retired in fitting time if the object were unattainable. But the American system sends men to battle under the leadership of officers who are chosen because they have political influence, or can make loud speeches, or are very liberal with their liquor at the tavern bar; or even because they have kept a tavern bar, and have not been over harsh in insisting on the payment of scores. With such machinery of war the enlightened people of America are content, or have been content, to fight the greatest contest which the present generation has seen. It is hardly conceivable that they will not one of these days make short work with a system which makes a battle a mere savage scramble, to which (again thanks to the system) men are hounded on to satisfy the exigencies of faction.

Mr. Charles Dance, the dramatic writer, died on the 5th inst. at Lewisham, whither he had gone for the benefit of his health, having suffered for some time from disease of the heart. He was in his sixty-ninth year of his age. Mr. Dance was successively reptile fat, taxing office, and chief clerk of the late Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors.

THE COURT.

The Queen has graciously permitted an official announcement of the arrangements of the Court during the ensuing season. We gather therefrom that upon the occasion of the arrival in this country of her Royal Highness Princess Alexandra of Denmark, previous to her marriage, early in March, with his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, her Royal Highness will land at Gravesend, and Her Majesty's yacht Victoria and Albert at Gravesend, where her Royal Highness will be received by the Prince of Wales. Their Royal Highnesses will then proceed to London, and be conveyed in her Majesty's carriages, with military escort, through the metropolis to Windsor Castle. It is also the Queen's intention that in the course of the year before she shall be held, on the part of her Majesty, by his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales; and that Drawing-rooms shall also be held on her Majesty's behalf by one of her Royal Highnesses the Princesses, her Majesty's daughters, or, after her marriage, by her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales. Shortly after the marriage the Queen's first State Ball will be held, in her Majesty's name, an evening reception at St. James's Palace, at which the usual gentlemen invited by the Lord Chamberlain, by the Queen's command, will have an opportunity of offering their congratulations to their Royal Highnesses.

On the 3rd inst. the Queen drove out, accompanied by Princess Beatrice. Princess Louis of Hesse also took a carriage airing.

On the 4th the Prince of Wales, Prince Arthur, Prince Leopold, Princess Helena, Princess Louise, and Prince Louis of Hesse attended Divine service at Whippingham Church.

On the 5th the Prince of Wales left Osborne for Buckingham Palace. His Royal Highness Prince Arthur accompanied his brother to London, and afterwards proceeded to Bagshot Park.

On the 6th the Prince of Wales left town for Sandringham Hall, his Royal Highness's estate in Norfolk.

On the 7th the Queen and the Royal family walked and drove in the grounds of Osborne.

Princess Louis of Hesse has suffered no injury or inconvenience from her late accident, and her Royal Highness is able to take her walks and drives as usual.

Major-General the Hon. A. N. Hood and Colonel the Hon. A. Hardinge have arrived in waiting on her Majesty's household, in succession to Major-General Seymour and Lieutenant-Colonel Du Plat.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and Princess Mary of Cambridge, the Duke and Duchess of Beaufort with a visit at Badminton early in the ensuing week.

His Excellency the Saxon Minister has returned to town from Dresden, to resume his official duties.

The Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch are entertaining a succession of visitors at Dalkeith Palace, near Edinburgh.

A Lieutenant-Colonel has left town for Lord Du Cheris's seat, Clandeboye House, Belfast.

Viscount Palmerston, left Broadlands on Wednesday for Osborne.

Sir Robert Peel has left Whitehall-gardens on his return to Ireland. Lady Emily Peel is staying at Nice for the winter. Her Ladyship is in improved health.

Sir Charles Younge, Garter King-at-Arms, has again visited the Chapel Royal, Windsor, with his assistants, and placed over the stalls the banners of the Knights-companions of the Most Noble Order of the Garter of Mecklenburg-Strelitz and Frederick Guillaume Louis Charles of Hesse, the newly-elected Knights of the Order.

PRINCESS ALEXANDRA.—A Copenhagen letter of the 20th ult. says:—"The Hon. A. B. Paget, the English Minister at this Court, and Mr. Hall, the Danish Minister at Berne, at Paris, who has received special powers from the King on the subject, have commenced the necessary negotiations relative to the marriage of Princess Dagmar's sister. There is a dot of 100,000 rix dollars (about £12,000), to be voted legislatively, will be allowed the Princess by the Rigsraad. The Princess will not accompany her sister Highness to London, but will only remain with her during the stay of the Danish Royal family in the English capital. Princess Frederick will probably stop in that country for some time after his sister's marriage, and he intends, it is said, to study for some months at Oxford."

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

The special services under the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral were resumed on Sunday last, when a sermon was preached.

The new schools in connection with Twickenham parish church were formally inaugurated on New-Year's Eve.

The Rev. Thomas Jackson, M.A., Rector of St. Olave's, Hart-street, has been appointed Rural Dean of the Tower Division.

The Rev. E. Dowland, of St. John's College, Cambridge, and Head Master of the Grammar School connected with that college, succeeds the Dean and Chapter to the mastership of the Salisbury Cathedral School.

Heston Church, Northampton, was reopened on Christmas Day, after having undergone restoration. The old roof was found unsafe, and, as portions of the building had nearly fallen down, and others had been pulled up in the progress of repair.

St. James's Church, Clifton, was consecrated on the 30th ult. The Archbishop elect of York preached. The building, which is a chapel-of-ease to Clifton parish church, has been erected and endowed to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the Rev. J. Homan in his incumbency of Clifton.

The Rev. G. Bennett, B.A., has been elected Second Master of King Edward's Grammar School, Chelmsford. Mr. Bennett was selected from sixty-one candidates, has hitherto been Head Master of the Grammar School, St. Mary's, Rector of Jamestown, and Government Inspector of Schools in the island.

The enormous access of visitors to Westminster Abbey during the new year season has rendered necessary, we learn, the following arrangements have been made that may be effected with the least interference to Divine worship. On the 1st of January, when the Sunday service will be carried on in Henry VII.'s Chapel. On Sunday, the 11th, the Lord Bishop of Oxford will preach, the 18th, the north transept will be open to the public; and on Sunday, the 25th, Divine service will be entirely suspended.

There are in England and Wales 28 Bishops, 30 Deans, 72 Archdeacons, 1,000 Rectors in London and its suburbs, 5,000 Rectors, 1036 benefices; in Scotland 7 Bishops, 161 clergy (of the Episcopal Church); in Ireland 156 clergymen. There are 2,000 clergymen in the colonies, 4 missionary Bishops, and 1781 clergy. The senior English Bishop, the Bishop of Winchester, is 87 years of age; so long ago as 1826 the Episcopal Church of Connecticut was consecrated in 1810, when George III. was King.

A Lieutenant's commission in the Royal Naval Reserve has been conferred on Captain Frederick Wm. Worrall, of the ship Tudor, of Liverpool.

It is expected (says the United Service Gazette) that a general order will shortly be issued to discontinue the purchase system for commissions in the Military Train.

The examination of candidates for commissions in the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers commenced at Chelsea Hospital on the 5th inst., before Major-General Hamilton, C.B., vice-president, and the other members of the Council on Military Education. The examinations occupied the week.

Another monster casting, containing 25 tons weight of iron, and intended as a bed or anvil for the monster steam-hammer in use at the iron factories department of the Woolwich Arsenal, has been cast down. This casting will take three weeks to cool.

An addition was made to the Royal Navy on the 6th inst. The iron screw-ship Tamar was launched from the yard of Messrs. Samuda, at Poplar. She is described as being a smart-looking craft of 2814 tons register and 700-horse power.

Up to the 31st of December 16,810 applications had been received, and 14,716 volunteers were enrolled in the Royal Naval Reserve, of these 41 possess certificates of competency as masters, 307 as mates, 19 of service as masters, and 99 as mates. The force also includes 2289 petty officers in the merchant service.

The officers of the Queen's (Royal) Lancers gave a splendid ball on the 8th inst. in the Pavilion, Brighton. All rooms were most tastefully decorated; and the ceiling lances, destructive pistols, and brightly-polished swords, which, only a few years ago, had been used in the suppression of the Indian mutiny, were gracefully arranged on the walls of the principal saloon. The band of this distinguished corps, aided by Wippell's band, played throughout the evening, and with such spirit that the dancing, which commenced soon after ten o'clock, was kept up without a break till the dawn of the supper was announced, and the scene that presented itself reminded one of the gorgeous banquets given in Paradise by the late George IV. Invitations were sent to the principal visitors of Brighton, and to almost all the regiments serving at the town; in addition to the officers of the Royal Sussex Regiment, the Lancers were invited. Two officers of the Belgian Cuirassiers attended; and the uniforms of Hussars, Yeomanry Cavalry, heavy dragoons, Scots Greys, Highlanders, riflemen, infantry—gave a very enlivening appearance to the room.

THE ENGLISH NAVY.—The annual official return of the number, name, tonnage, armament, and horse-power of each vessel, both steamers and sailing-ships, commanded by officers in the Royal Navy on the 1st inst., under the authority of the Lords of the Admiralty. Including steamers of 60 of pre-bundle, the Navy of England on the 1st of July numbered 1014 ships of all classes. Of this number there are eighty-five iron-of-battle ships, mounting 2,000 guns, to 31 of which are attached engines of 8,000 nating; sixty-nine frigates, of from 24 guns to 46 guns each, mounting 1,000 guns, to which engines and horse-power; 21 of a line-of-battle ship's rate; seven corvettes, each mounting 21 guns; and upward's of 600 frigates and vessels of all classes, mounting about 1,000 guns. In addition to these there are, in round number, 190 gun-boats, each mounting two heavy Armstrong guns, and of 60-horse power. Lastly, a numerous squadron of iron and wooden floating forts built during the Russian War, and now laid up at Chatham. At present there are forty-three vessels actually commissioned, and employed in the service of the public and private dockyards, many of which will be completed and launched during the month of January. The following are the building:—Iron ships: The Agincourt, 50; the Minotaur, 50; the Royal Alfred, 50; the Northumberland, 50; the Conn, 50; the Hero, 50; the Caradoc, 32; the Research, 32; and the Enterprise, 4669 tons, 150-horse power, at Deptford. The iron-coast frigates Sultan, 4045 tons, 800-horse power, at Pembroke; the Orlando, 3750 tons, at Chatham; the Penelope, at Pembroke; and the Clwdonian, at Woolwich. The iron steam-frigate Prince Albert, of 2,000 tons and 500-horse power, recently been commenced for the Admiralty at Millwall. The number of line-of-battle and frigate-ships composing the squadron on the North American station is twenty-nine. The squadron in the Mediterranean numbers twenty-seven vessels of all classes. The Channel squadron consists of twenty-one vessels. The number of ships stationed on the West Coast of Africa, including the vessels composing the squadron on the South American coast,

LITERATURE.

To the landscape-painter who would profit from many sensible hints we learn some useful expedients for facilitating his study from nature "on the spot;" to the general reader who would be interested with the details of a mode of life utterly unlike that of ordinary tourists, and certain adventures out of the usual track of fiction; to the thoughtful observer of the relations of the artist to society; and the lover of art and nature, we can recommend a two-volume work, lately published by Macmillan and Co., entitled A Painter's Camp on the Highlands. The book is not without faults, such as tiresome descriptions and irrelevant stories, a style often tediously prolix, and a reflecting many of Mr. Ruskin's peculiarities and prejudices, and a tone nearly always self-sufficient and occasionally offensively conceited; yet it bears out our recommendation by the value of the practical sense of the author, and the fascination of the sketches of real life, his autobiographic frankness and artistic enthusiasm. The life, his autobiographic frankness and artistic enthusiasm. life the author is Mr. Hamerton, a gentleman by education and by birth (as he of course says) but by choice and long-devoted himself to the study and practice of landscape-painting as a profession. He evidently belongs to that new class of painters who have in landscape pushed the positive character which nearly all modern English art is rapidly assuming, to that which might be termed "topographical." These artists aim at the utmost possible accuracy in the statement of the actual facts of the particular view shown in nature, the commonplace conditions, and the value of work before the scene itself, or from elaborate studies and memoranda taken from it, and trust as little as possible to memory or invention. Mr. Brett has carried this principle farthest hitherto, and is at the head of the literally imitative painters. Turner, we may remind the reader, is one of his "great shadowlights" the poet of nature in her opposite or representative and imaginative school. He painted everything more or less from memory and imagination, and always subordinated literal truth to the requirement of composition and his feeling for colour, form, and effect. "When Mr. Hamerton had decided the point, he, like his nature in would proceed to make a really fair dissatisfied with the ordinary preparations for a sketching tour. He therefore devised a portable hut, with plate-glass windows, capable of protecting against rain, snow, and cold, in which he could in perfect comfort, in the midst of a storm, paint the heather on a wild Scotch mountain side. The first experiment was a total rewreckfit on the sad and desolate mountains of Scotland. Desiring, further, to study the scenery surrounding Loch Awe, and being occupied with a series of adventures incidental to this gipsy life, with huts and double boats; some serious, as visits of night poachers; others humorous, as the history likewise of the English and Scotch servant; culinary difficulties, untamable horses, loch storms, prying country tourists, and the like, are related in the first volume, another is devoted to "Thoughts about Art," and contains the author's desultory cogitations during some years of artistic training, embodied in the form of miscellaneous essays upon criticism, and the probability of artists themselves using the pen to explain their works and to educate the public into the appreciation of their aims; and the want of a just recognition of the artist in general English society; upon picture-buying, wine and foolish; photography, amateurship, and disfiguring effects; the importance of accurate observation, transcendentalism, and the law of progress in art; painting from memoranda, and the use of models. These essays are, in a general sense, the comparisons are apt, and there is considerable power of analysis. But often the remarks are rather onesided, and sometimes prejudiced, as we may say in hasta. We agree, however, with Mr. Hamerton that "there is no subject in the world of which the full-world is less aware than landscape," to treat than art. It is eminently a subject requiring practical experience and especial study. It cannot possibly be grasped in its large relations by mere habitual familiarity with nature, because we know only claim to treat of it is their faculty of verbal expression. It requires also much technical knowledge. The devotion and enthusiasm are occasionally found in men who are not practically artists, the representation of which is the best out of art-criticism. Hamerton deals with works of art in their intellectual aspect only, with a slight admixture of technical matters, "the subjective reference to the facts of nature." "Our common critic at present have nothing to say, but they say it cleverly." Mere literary men are constantly imposed upon by the consummate tricks of the studio. The art-critic capable of a merely literary estimate of the merits of work of art were very painfully conscious of the history of the information he possesses. Yet we often hear the specious argument that the literary man represents the man of the intelligent public, and therefore is the best judge of what will please that public. The obvious answer to this is that the function of art is at least as much to teach as to delight, and that it is the highest office of art that it would be as reasonable to set up a mere literary man without any training as a judge of the attainments of the astronomer, chemist, mathematician, or engineer, as to permit him to expound the achievements of the artist. Art, technically considered, is only to be fully recorded in and read by artists. Even to the public, even out of the artistic profession, there are always a few capable of appreciating the highest excellence. On the other hand, the mere artist will be apt to estimate technicalities only. The true critics, the rule directors of public taste, "should be highly cultivated and just men, who feel the responsibility, and have had the personal acquaintance both with the products of art and the appearances of nature, and who have had practical experience in both." Mr. Hamerton devotes considerable space and makes many quotations to illustrate the little consideration felt for the artist and his calling in English society, as implied in the fact that he is not a recognised

NATIONAL SPORTS.

For lack of something better to do, not a few of "The Corner" men fraternized with the Manchester division on New-Year's Day at Manchester, and the backers of horses in general, and Lord Clifden in particular, may take it as an omen that the four races which composed the programme were won right off the reel by first favourites. The Cheshire Cup has closed with 173 subscribers, one of whom, the owner of Nutbush, did not name. In 1853 this great race reached 216, and again in 1856; while the average of 1860-61 has been 171. The Liverpool Steeplechase has closed with 74 entries, including those old standing clashes, Anatis, The Dane, and Ledsham. The Lancashire four stood next at 370gs. The highest public prices given by Lord Stamford have been 7,000gs. for a brood mare, Vanity, and 6,000gs. for a Royal yearling filly, Yamama.

Colonel Towneley is the principal illustration of the Sporting Magazine. The latest member attached to it is that which it is now thirty years since he first figured in the Calendar as the owner of Algiers and Sedgefield. More than twenty years passed away before the "white body and black sleeves" reappeared with Hesperithusa, and to some purposes, on the Ascot Hunt-Cup day. Birdy leads off with the pursuit of Sir Watkin Williams. The "Ten" is as formidable as ever, and "The Tale of the Old Customer" is a very neatly-written compliment from the weather-tot of Pet Wood, near Orpington bury, reappearing after his grandchildren's periodical sufferings at the hands of "Bob Ward."

Deerfoot and Faith run their one-hour's race, for £50 a side, on Monday, at Hackney-wick. It is expected, judging from Deerfoot's time at West Brompton Ground last year, that they will cover at least eleven miles a half.

Kingwater was beaten in the run-up for the Scarisbrick Cup at Southport, on Monday, (as did a better one than he) by a very fine force at Kenilworth, where Mr. Randell's Revenge and Mr. Rastez's Rebo, beat Mr. Gretton Regan, two Homesickfields, and Trap for the Kenilworth Stakes. The meetings for next week are Spithorne Club (Hampton Court), on Tuesday and Wednesday; 3rd Forest Club (Chingford), on Thursday; 4th, Wimbledon; 5th, Leamington; Leicester Club and Broughton, on Wednesday and Thursday; and Cork Southern Club, on Saturday, Hurdle, and Steeplechase.

Sport has improved with the Fytcheley, and there has been plenty of hunting in Leicestershire during the past ten days, but still they do not get the sport we expected after the first week in the year. The Duke of Rutland's have had one or two good days in the Weaver's Lodge country, and a very good one on Wednesday with Mr. Gretton's new cover. One fox slipped off before the hounds were thrown in, but they found a brace at home, and settled to one directly, away for Apethorpe by the Park Spinney, through the gap through Stapleford Park, where a slight check at the palings saved his life. Then to the Stapleford Park Spinney, where he bent to the right at a tremendous pace, over Lesothorpe Hill, along Burton Flat, over the grass to Wheat Hills, where they checked again, and then by Little Dalby and the Hoby Road to Brook Hill Gorse, the ten miles as the hounds ran it were done in little more than forty minutes. The pace was scarcely 9½ all a dozen miles, and 10 the time. Mr. Calthorpe on Fakeaway had the best of it, and the noble owner of the pack, Lord Wilton, and Mr. Burbidge on their greys, Mr. Gilmour on Bay Middleton, Mr. G. Johnstone on Sandboy, Mr. Hazard, and Lord De Grey also played. They then went to Freely Wood, and here a fine turn with a short-running fox put them at it up. Nearly five hundred met Lord Stamford at Brookby on Monday, and out of the lot the second whip had the misfortune to break his collar-bone. They found at Gumley Gorse, and had a short fast thing with very heavy jumping, past Doubleday's Lodge and over the road in the bottom to the Canal, where the pace was hot, fox was headed, and turned short through Ashby Pasture to Gaddesby. Near the village the hounds changed foxes, and here soon after when running up the valley for Cream Gorse Mr. Tailby has recently reduced his number of hunting-days from four to three, on account, it said, of a lack of foxes in the home country. A very large field met these hounds at Knossington on Tuesday. A fox slipped out of the gorse, and Mr. Tailby was there and they could do good with him, and went on to Overton Park Wood, and had six miles without a check by Pickwell to Little Dalby, the pace and fences all that could be wished. Then they found again at the Punch Bowl, and ran over Burrow Hills. The ground was very heavy, and it was a very trying day for both horse and hound. Mr. Arthur Harbord and its neighbourhood is very full, and the stud and riding of Captain Carnegie the talk of the hour. Melton Mowbray still many people to let, and a lack of foxes there has been very dull. Major Painter's stud has arrived, and upwards of twenty of his hunters are coming down to Melton for the Sir Stephens' stables. Two steeplechases, one for farmers and one for gentlemen (heavy weights), are spoken of for the day after Croxton Park races, and it is also reported that the Farmers' Plate at Croxton Park is to have more money added to it.

In the ensuing Term there are 157 applications to be admitted as attorneys, of which 82 are to be made for the first time.

HIS Majesty has signified to Miss Emily Faithfull her acceptance of a copy of the volume of poems just issued from the Victoria Press "in aid of Lucanieire, signifying, at the same time, her sympathy with its object.

The Opinione of Turin gives an account of a prolonged encounter with a party of thirty-four brigands, near Cavenna, Naples, in which only two were wounded, and those slightly, and one gala and horse fell to the tooth.

The Hawthorne, screw-steamer, from Cagliari, has arrived at Marstino Island, twelve miles from Sicily, having laid the cable successfully to that port. She was ordered thence to Malta to ship additional cable, required for carrying the line to Alexandria, and was expected to sail of course by currents.

The municipality of Florence have done honour to themselves and to the memory of Mrs. Barrett Browning by placing a marble slab in the wall of the house she occupied in that city, with an inscription cut in Italian, to this effect:—"Elizabeth Barrett Browning lived, wrote, and died in this house. She was a woman, a woman by virtue, a poetess by the wisdom of a sage and the spirit of a true poet, and made her poetry a golden band between Italy and England."

The life-boat of the National Life-boat Institution stationed on the Brunton Sands, North Devon, was instrumental in rescuing twenty persons from the wreck of Lorian, of Bremen, on the night of the 28th of the last mut. The ship was being towed across the bar by two steam-tugs, when the weather and the dangerous breaking passage drove the vessel upon one those dangerous sands. The life-boat of the institution stationed at Dunkerque, on the coast of France, was also the means of saving seventeen of the hetch Neuha, of Berwick-on-Tweed, which was totally wrecked on the Abertay Sands, on the night of Tuesday, in a most severe gale and snow weather on the 6th inst.——The late Mr. John Jolly, farmer, of Eastnor, Oxford, has left a legacy of two hundred guineas to the National Life-boat Institution.

AFRICAN GASTRONOMICS.—Of all insect delicacies in Africa, the white ants are the most delicious, and in the interior are much appreciated at the swarming season, are actively collected. They are then about half an inch long, of a pale greyish-red, and very fat. When roasted they have a delicious crab-like flavour. An idea of the esteem in which this dish is held may be formed from the expression of a native woman, addressing Dr. Livingstone, on the banks of the Zongo. "The Bayeiyi chief," he says, "visiting his white eating, I gave him a piece of bread and preserved apricots, and, as he seemed to relish it much, I asked him if he had any food equal to that in his country." 'Ah!' said he, did you ever taste white ants?' As I never had, he replied, 'Well, if you had, you never could have desired to eat anything better.'—Cassell's Natural History.

When, in 1859, Milan was delivered from the hands of Austria through the active intervention of France, the ladies of that city formed a committee for the collection of a fund among the people to purchase a sword of the French as a mark of gratitude to the nation that had so generously quit the land of the Austrian. Victor Vela, the sculptor, was commissioned to make it, and the conception of his genius, after having been exhibited for a few days in the rooms of the Albertine Academy at Milan, is on its way to Paris. The group, entitled "The Kiss of Italy to France," represents two females of the size of life, one being France the other Italy, the latter in the attitude of imprinting on the former the kiss of gratitude. The figure of Italy is bare to the waist, the remainder of the person being concealed by the rich folds of a mantle seen only behind; her hands are folded in an attitude of thankfulness. The figure of France is entirely covered with well-conceived drapery, and the whole group is surrounded by the emblems of the Italian and Gallic states some of the folds of the Imperial mantle. The group is of a character to do honour to the artist, and is spoken of in the highest manner as executed in execution and conception.—Galignani.

THE FRENCH AT MEXICO.—The first published, says Galignani, bears the date of Nuremberg, 1857; the first English one was in 1622; and the first French, in 1661, in which year a second edition was offered for sale in the Liter collection, and of which a duplicate exists in the British Museum. It is entitled Voyage en Espagne et Italie. The author visited Spain and Italy, and bears the date of February, 1334. The catalogue gave the following account of it:—"A curious and exceedingly rare journal, which appears to have been printed at Nuremberg. It contains the first announcement of the discovery of Peru, and the first mention of tobacco. It is also distinguished that we have been able to consult. In this printed sheet it is said that Francis Pizarro, the conqueror of Peru, in 1534 sent to his Majesty (Charles V.) that a vessel had arrived from Peru with a letter from the Regent, Francisco Pizarro (Orinano), announcing that he had taken possession of the country; that with about 200 Spaniards, infantry and cavalry, he had repaired to the mountains of Peru, where the chief of the land (who refused peace) and attacked him, that the Spaniards were the victors, that he had taken the chief prisoner, and received from him as a ransom for his person, and liberty, a large quantity of gold from the said Cassika."

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent).

THE prospect of the Mexican war has occasionable increased purchases have been effected in National Securities, and prices, almost generally, have been on the upward move. Consols have risen from 90¼ to 90¾, and Exchequer bonds have reduced, higher quotations are anticipated. Indian Stocks, &c., have ruled steady, and have been freely, at very full prices, and the Unfunded Debt has been remarkably steady.

The Discount Market is well supplied with capital, and the demand for accommodation has been much more than in the previous week. The investment quotations for the best commercial paper, however, are as follows:—

Bank Bills ..... 3 per cent. | Four months' bills ..... 3½ @ 4
Sixty days' bills ..... 3 @ 3 | Six months' bills ..... 3½ @ 4
Two months' bills ..... 3½ @ 3½

In the Stock Exchange very little capital can be had under 2½ per cent. Throughout the week the Bullion in the Bank of England has increased in the value of money. We annex the rates in the leading cities:—

	Bank rate.	Open market.		Bank rate.	Open market.

The exchanges at New York remain at 145 to 145½, and the premium on gold 42 per cent. Further engagements of specie have been made for shipment to England. This week the arrivals from America have amounted to about £1,000,000. A large amount of specie remains on hand, but the Bank Directors at about £120,000 has been withdrawn for export purposes.

The following is the return of the Governor and Bank of England.

The Council for India have disposed of £600,000 in bills on India. The applications amounted to £1,800,000. The minimum rate of discount was 1s. 11⅛d. per rupee on Calcutta, and 2s. on Bombay and Madras.

The Bank of France, shares, and the Government Securities have been steady, and the Bank of Belgium has declared a dividend at the rate of 12 per cent per annum.

We understand that the Japanese Government redeemed £1,934,050 of their public debt last year.

The Bullion in the Bank is by no means active, at 61¾ per ounce for bar qualities. There are very few dollars in the market; consequently, they are very dear.

On Monday, Home Stocks were rather higher, with considerable firmness in the Railway Share Market. Consols for money left off at 90¾, for account, 90⅝; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 92⅞; Exchequer Bills, 8s. to 12s. pm.; Bonds, 1s. to 2s. pm.; India Stock, 220 to 222; Ditto Bonds, 2s. to 3s. pm.; and the Debentures, 102; the Five per Cent Rupee Paper realised 103¾. THE CIVIL WAR IN AMERICA: GENERAL LONGSTREET'S CORPS (CONFEDERATES) CROSSING THE BLUE RIDGE FROM THE SHENANDOAH TO THE RAPPAHANNOCK, VIRGINIA.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

Number contains three Illustrations by our Special Artist, respecting which he writes as follows:—

NIGHT AMUSEMENTS IN THE CONFEDERATE CAMP.

"Every evening, when we cluster around our pine-log fires, the 'darkies' press in amongst us and listen to the yarns their masters spin. In our camp we are fortunate enough to possess the most famous banjo-player in the Southern States, and when Sweny strikes up one of his quaint old Virginian breakdowns, some nigger is sure to 'wade' in and put his legs through a series of marvellous gyrations, to the delight of the sympathetic lookers-on, who beat time for him. Although the enemy is within cannon-shot, no one experiences the least uneasiness, and the universal refrain is, 'We'll sing to-night and fight to-morrow—bullyboys, oh!'"

GENERAL LONGSTREET'S CORPS CROSSING THE BLUE RIDGE, VIRGINIA.

"Of the entire Confederate army encamped near Winchester Jackson's corps alone remains, and that, I presume, will soon follow the main body into London County, where Burnside menaces with an immense army the line of the Rappahannock in this, the third, advance of the Federals on Richmond. The subject of the Engraving is one of the picturesque passes in the Blue Ridge, with General Longstreet's corps-d'armée passing through on its way to Culpeppar to hold in check the Northern forces. The scenery of these Virginian mountains reminds me forcibly of the Apennines, and recalls many scenes which I have witnessed with Garibaldi's forces in Southern Italy."

POSITION OF THE FEDERAL AND THE CONFEDERATE PICKETS AT FREDERICKSBURG ON DEC. 4.

"The Rappahannock at Fredericksburg (writes our Artist on the day he took the above Sketch) is scarcely more than a hundred yards in width, and this is the distance that divides the Confederates from the Federals. The pickets of each army are within earshot and in full view of each other, and they frequently indulge in remarks that might be taken exception to in polite society. While making the accompanying Sketch a sentinel who was leaning on his musket, looking over me, suddenly called out to a blue-coated German on the other side, 'How many men have you got over thar, Yank?' 'Doo or dree dousand,' grunted the Teuton. 'Oh, bring them along; that's nothing. We reckoned you had an army!' It is whispered at head-quarters to-day that an attempt will be made by the enemy to cross the river at three different points during the night. Everything is ready for them when they come, and the battle that will possibly take place within the next few days must determine, as far as the Federals are concerned, whether the war is to continue or not: it will be by far the largest and most important of the whole campaign. Probably not less than 250,000 men will be engaged. I am lying out in the pine-woods at the advance, ready to wield my pencil when the struggle begins. Every shot we hear as we lie with our feet to the fire during the long cold nights starts us on our legs, for we know the enemy has his pontoons ready to cross in the darkness. What a bursting of shells over my bed then will be when the ball opens!"

FREDERICKSBURG.

The little town of Fredericksburg, which has been rendered famous by the great battle fought near it on the 13th ult., had previously suffered much usage, having been alternately in the hands of Confederates and Federals two or three times. It is the chief town of Spottsylvania county, Virginia, and is situated on the right bank of the Rappahannock River, at the head of tide-water. It is between fifty and sixty miles from Richmond by railroad, and sixty-five miles by the turnpike, in a northerly direction. The town is pleasantly situated in a fertile valley, and has advantages for commerce and manufactures. The railroad from Washington, via Acquia Creek, passes through it, and as the through-trains generally stop at Fredericksburg Station for about an hour on each trip, a not inconsiderable chance trade was caused thereby in the immediate locality of the depôt. A good canal has been constructed from the town to a point on the Rappahannock River about forty miles above, by which large quantities of wheat, flour, and tobacco were formerly received for exportation. The river affords extensive water power, which, however, has not been much used. The hills in the neighbourhood, varying from forty to one hundred feet high, abound in fine granite and free-stone.

About thirty years since the prospect of Fredericksburg being a rapidly-rising town was very great; but it suddenly stopped in its prosperity, and after, as it were, standing still for about twenty years, gradually retrograded in importance. In 1840 its population numbered nearly 4000 souls, and in 1850, ten years after, it had only increased eighty-eight persons—less than nine each year, and being about two per cent in the decade—a remarkably small increase. Before the war it contained five churches, one orphan asylum, two seminaries, four newspaper-offices, and two banks. Such was Fredericksburg. The correspondent of the New York Times reports:—"It is 'living' Fredericksburg 'no more.' A city, soulless, rent by the wrack of war, and shooting up in flames athwart night's sky, is the pretty little antique spot by the Rappahannock, erewhile the peculiar scene of dignified ease and retirement."

The Rappahannock River rises in the Blue Ridge, but a few miles from the south fork of the Shenandoah, and pursues an easterly course to Fredericksburg, some sixty miles south-south-west of Washington city, where it is within ten miles of the Potomac. It has here become a broad navigable stream, though its extreme sources are hardly eighty miles distant. From Fredericksburg it has a general south-east course till it is lost in Chesapeake Bay, some twenty-five miles below the mouth of the Potomac. For the Bay, some twenty-five miles below the mouth of the Potomac. For the Bay, some twenty-five miles below are commanded by the Union gun-boats, prevent its course below Fredericksburg is commanded by the Union gun-boats, but above that city it becomes disputable, and has for months in good part divided the Union from the Confederate forces. It naturally forks towards its source into innumerable streams and rivulets, but at first, some ten miles above Fredericksburg, into two main branches, whereof that coming from the north-west retains the name of Rappahannock, while that from the south-west is known as the Rapidan.

LAYING THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF CHRIST CHURCH, THE FIRST PROTESTANT CHURCH IN NAPLES.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

MESSRS. YATES AND POWER'S ENTERTAINMENT AT THE EGYPTIAN HALL, PICCADILLY: "THE INVITATION TO THE SEASIDE."—SEE PAGE 55.

LAYING THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF A PROTESTANT CHURCH IN NAPLES.

On the 16th ult. an event occurred of the highest interest and importance to the British community in Naples—the laying of the first stone of an English Protestant church. Among those present were his Serene Highness Captain Prince Leiningen, the Duchess of St. Serene Highness Captain Prince Leiningen, the Duchess of St. Arpino, the Duchess of Sutherland, Lady Strachan, the Hon. Mrs. Rowley and her daughter, the Hon. Mr. and Mrs. De Grey, and Lady Sarah Maitland and Colonel Maitland, besides a host of others more or less distinguished, who took a lively interest in the ceremony. The Rev. F. Maitland having offered up a prayer, the first stone was laid by the Duchess of St. Arpino, an English lady, who, though married to a Neapolitan nobleman, had clung to her religion and Church even when the days were evil. The architect is Mr. Smith, and the cost of the edifice will be more than three-fourths is already subscribed. On advancing to lay the stone the Duchess was thus addressed by one of the committee:—"She had been requested by the committee, on account, not its occasion, but of the high social position, but of her adherence to the faith of her fathers in Italy, when firmness was a great virtue. Another motive, too, had influenced them, and that was a desire to acknowledge through her husband—an Italian and a liberal-minded nobleman—the sympathy which they had received from the Italian nation, more especially from that great and good man who conquered the liberties of this southern province, and from the Sovereign who so honestly maintains the civil and religious liberties of the people."

The Duchess very briefly and gracefully replied as follows:—"It is difficult for me to find words to express the pleasure it has given me in having been selected by the committee to lay the foundation-stone of a Protestant church in Southern Italy. I must also thank the committee and express to them the gratification I feel at this flattering proof of their confidence, and that it is a day that will be long remembered in every heart to which the Protestant religion is dear, and with thankfulness to the Almighty that He has permitted us to belong to so pure a Church."

BADGE AND CHAIN

FOR THE MAYOR OF BIRMINGHAM.

Under instructions from the Mayor and Corporation of Birmingham, Messrs. Elkington and Elkington have prepared a handsome chain and badge for that municipality. The chain, which is of great cost, bears the initials of the Mayors who have at various times filled the important office. The central monogram, is formed of the initials of Wm. Scholefield, Esq., M.P., the first Mayor. The badge, which is of 22-carat gold, is a beautiful specimen of enamel work in proper colours. The various monograms are composed of the initials of the successive Mayors in the order of their dates, as follows:—William Scholefield; 1838 and 1839; Henry Mantz, 1839 and 1840; Samuel Beale, 1841; James James, 1842; Thomas Weston, 1843; Thomas Phillips, 1844; Henry Smith, 1845 and 1851; Robert Martineau, 1846; Charles Geach, 1847; Samuel Thornton, 1848; William Middlemore, 1849 and 1850; Henry Smith, elected second time, 1851; Henry Hawkes, 1852; James Baldwin, 1853; John Ratcliff, 1854; Philip Henry Muntz, 1855; John Radcliff, 1856 and 1857; Sir John Radcliff, Kt., 1858; Thomas Lloyd, 1859; Arthur Ryland, 1860; Henry Manton, 1861; Charles Sturge, 1862.

BADGE AND CHAIN OF THE MAYOR OF BIRMINGHAM.

BENDING ARMOUR-PLATES AT CHATHAM DOCKYARD.

The process of bending plates for casing the sides of our new ironclad fleet is of a most interesting and wonderful character, the immense slabs of iron, varying from 5in. to 4½in. in thickness, being converted into any form of curve by the hydraulic ram as easily as though they were sheets of paper.

These machines are manufactured by Messrs. Westwood, Baillie, Campbell, and Co., of London-yard, Poplar, and can exert a pressure equal to 1200 tons, being sufficiently powerful to bend and twist with the greatest facility iron or steel armour-plates up to 9in. thick, while cold, into any required forms requisite to fit the curves of the vessels for which they are intended. The diameter of the ram used is 26in., and the crossheads, of solid cast iron, exceed twelve tons each in weight; the machine is so admirably arranged that the cylinder and ram are made to traverse from side to side by one man with the greatest ease, and the plates can be moulded without difficulty.

This machine will take in plates 6ft. wide and of any length; it is also useful for bending or straightening large masses of iron, such as large shafts for machinery, rudder-posts, stems, and stern-frames for ships. It can be used as a punching-machine for pressing out large bosses for fan or any other purpose where enormous pressure is required.

The process of giving the required form to these plates is as follows:—By a simple and ingenious crane, which travels above, the plate is brought over the cylinder of the press, on the ram or piston of which a piece of iron is placed, and on this the plate is rested. Two similar pieces of iron are then arranged on each side of the upper surface of the plate, the whole being then kept down by a rod passing from the centre of it carries out the required form of curvature.

The most striking feature in this bending process is the perfect absence of all noise. The skilful workman who stands in front of the machine and controls the entire working, is furnished with thin wooden mallets of the size of a walking-stick, and strikes at different portions of the plates. His directions for moving the cylinder and starting the pumps are carried out by the assistant in front of him, who, by means of a lever, connects the cylinder to the pumps as required, and by a bell communicates with those who attend to the pumps. A gentle writhing of the plate is then perceptible, and the moulding of it accomplished.

"THE MORNING OF THE BATTLE OF AGINCOURT."

PAINTED BY J. GILBERT.—IN THE WINTER EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

It was a curious sight to meet with this really fine picture in an exhibition of "sketches and studies." Whatever estimate the artist may place on his work, we remember scarcely anything from his hand worthy the finishing, the careful and artistic display of his unrivalled facility of hand, and with such excellent balance in every part of design, colour, handling, and manipulation, that a carelessness—not to call even a water-colour "drawing" would seem disparagement; for, from the most opaque bold use of body-colour, it has the greatest impasto and almost the same force and richness as a painting in oil, while it is free from that embroilment of the opaque and transparent colours we sometimes see in this style of painting. In conception, also, we think this a more than ordinarily successful effort. Character, action, sentiment, feeling—the masterly distribution of the groups, rainy autumnal morning air; the dim dawn, hardly paling the still burning torch—the flare of which strikes no sparkle from the rusty armour—and scarcely permitting some of the figures to loom from the drifting smoke and driving clouds where fitfully sail or slowly circle the ill-omened carrion crows;—all this and more is here expressed or admirably indicated. We cannot, indeed, in justice, this time at least, withhold from Mr. Gilbert the very high praise that he has given us an adequate illustration of Shakspeare—an illustration deeply felt, imaginative, and, moreover, free from exaggeration.

Further description of the subject is needless when we can quote the passage in "King Henry V." which Mr. Gilbert has illustrated, and so successfully that it would be unfair not to do so. It is that in which Lord Grandpree, to the French camp, speaks in pity and contempt of the worn and half-starved little English army, which, though but one to six, within a few hours overthrew the fresh and confident hosts of the foe, and almost annihilated the choicest chivalry of France:—

> Yon island carrions, desperate of their bones,
> Ill-favour'dly become the morning field:
> Their ragged curtains poorly are let loose,
> And our air shakes them passing scornfully.
> Big Mars seems bankrupt in their beggar'd host,
> And faintly through a rusty beaver peeps.
> Their horsemen sit like fixed candlesticks,
> With torch-staves in their hands: and their poor jades
> Lob down their heads, dropping the hide and hips;
> The gum down-roping from their pale-dead eyes;
> And in their pale dull mouths the gimmal bit
> Lies foul with chew'd grass—still and motionless;
> And their executors, the knavish crows,
> Fly o'er them all, impatient for their hour.
> Description cannot suit itself in words
> To demonstrate the life of such a battle,
> In life so lifeless as it shows itself.

To which the Constable (Constable) of France confidently rejoins:—

> They have sold their pastures, and they stay for death.

The main facts of the great Battle of Agincourt, fought Oct. 25, 1415, and which enabled Henry V. soon after to obtain the crown of France, are known to almost every child. We may, however, venture to remind the reader that the French force numbered 60,000, the English only 15,000. Of the French, there were, according to some accounts, 10,000 killed (of whom 3000 were persons of rank) and 14,000 taken prisoners. The English loss, which included the Duke of York and the Earl of Suffolk, has been set down at an incredibly small number. St. Remi asserts, with more probability, that we had 1000 put hors de combat. Among the French slain were the Dukes of Brabant, Alençon, Bar, the Archbishop of Sens, one Marshal, thirteen Earls, ninety-two Barons, and 1500 Knights. Among the prisoners (which were far more numerous than the whole British army) were the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, and 7000 Barons, Knights, and gentlemen.

VICTORIA, VANCOUVER ISLAND.

The Engraving of this town at page 45, in to-day's Issue, is a reduced copy of a clever photographic panorama by Mr. Geo. R. Fardon, a pioneer of the art in Vancouver Island, whose views in that department at the International Exhibition were examined with interest by many.

Victoria is situated on ground which rises gently from the water for a few hundred yards, and then as gradually descends; a ravine traversing the site through its centre will be found a valuable assistance to perfect drainage.

The inlet, a portion of which forms the harbour of Victoria, is a shallow river-like estuary, abounding in oyster-beds and extending to within a few yards of Esquimalt Harbour, some three miles distant. At its mouth, to the right of our Engraving, a stern-wheel steam boat is departing for Fraser River, or to load with coal at the Nanaimo mines. This class of boats is particularly adapted for the navigation of that rapid and in places very contracted river. At this point of land she is passing has been used as an Indian graveyard, and is ornamented with mutilated and uncouth life-sized wooden images.

A short distance beyond on this promontory is a group of Government buildings; the larger one is used as offices by his Excellency the Governor, and behind it is the Provincial Parliament House, and the smaller ones on each side are the Treasury and the Land Offices. To facilitate access to these, the long white wooden bridge has been erected across James's Bay, which, at low water, is a mudflat.

Over the hill, abreast of the prettily-placed residence of the governor, lies the favourite drive, walk or ride to Beacon-hill, which may be termed the Hyde Park of the Victorians. Nature has favoured this spot greatly. It is a well-conveyed mound, about 120ft. in height; around its base are the racecourse and cricket-ground. On three sides it is surrounded by a natural park of oak and fir-trees; on the other its summit has been levelled into small bays by the waters of Puca Straits, here about twenty miles wide. From this eminence snow-capped Mount Baker, with an altitude of more than 10,000ft., is a grand object in the eastern horizon; and to the north, partially obscured by trees, the church spires, houses, and suburban cottages form a pleasing picture both to eye and mind.

There are two Episcopal churches in Victoria—Christ's Church, seen on elevated ground near James's Bay, and St. John's, an iron structure, centrally located in the suburbs. The former is a wooden colonial edifice, and the latter was kindly contributed by friends in England. The Established Church in this colony is self-supporting. It should be mentioned, however, that the munificence of Miss Burdett Coutts endowed the bishopric of British Columbia, and to this, though a separate colony, Vancouver may be termed a dependence.

Of buildings for worship there are also a Wesleyan—the spire of which is an ornament to the town—a Roman Catholic, a Congregational, and a Presbyterian chapel.

All branches of education are taught in half a dozen schools; the charges are moderate in all, and the poorest residents can well afford to bestow good education on their children. The Bishop has had a large schoolhouse erected on the Indian reservation, where young aborigines are zealously instructed, and show considerable aptitude.

Hidden in the Engraving by the large new warehouse of the Hudson's Bay Company is a brick prison, whose inmates are principally those guilty of selling ardent spirits to Indians; and there is by a handsome fire-proof building for the Treasury.

There are two fire companies, formed on the voluntary self-supporting system.

The wharfage is ample. The old warehouses of the company have been lately removed. Fort-street runs through the centre of the former enclosure, and several fine brick houses have been built on this portion of the town land. In consequence of limited space for wharfage, the old bridge leading to Esquimault (seen on the left) has been removed, thereby increasing the deep-water frontage, and bridges have been substituted over shoals higher up the inlet.

The Victoria Gas Company, Limited, has a small investment, running nearly parallel to the water; and Johnson, Yates, and Fort streets, from the water towards the interior. Temporary wooden shells of houses and shops were built when the town was an experiment, are being replaced by substantial brick ones, and of three about fifty have been erected. Two new wharves are constructed of wood, and were frequented in the six months ending June 30, 1861, by 650 vessels of 53,443 aggregate tonnage, and crews numbering 3525.

The imports for twelve months ending on the same date were £463,935 in value; during March, 1862, they amounted to £52,350. It was estimated that 25,000 persons annually passed through Victoria and Vancouver in the summer of 1858, and in the following spring that not more than 400 of them remained in the latter colony, whilst the population of Victoria was reduced to fewer than 2000. Since that year there has been a steady increase; the population of British Columbia being considered as 6500 in 1861, and that of Vancouver as 2500, four-fifths of whom resided in Victoria and its vicinity. It is reasonable to attribute this gradual accession to the effect of private advices, and to regard it as a mere satisfactory immigration than that produced by exciting news from the goldfields lately published.

The prosperity of Victoria mainly depends on its being a free port, thereby enabling merchants to supply the North Pacific markets with European goods at lower rates than will remunerate competitors in other cities on that coast. To effect this result the revenue is derived from direct taxation and the sale of Government land; these sources appear likely to yield sufficiently if expended with prudence.

The second ground Victoria is very picturesque, and pleasant walks, rides, or boating excursions may be taken in every direction; several lakes within a few miles afford sport for the angler; but, though grouse or other game is driven far from the settlement, wild water-fowl are plentiful in the season, and the sportsman will supplied with fish and a variety of game by those who fish or hunt for a livelihood. The climate of Victoria from June to October is truly delightful; during the winter months snow seldom remains on the ground, but much rain falls, and in these months the climate closely resembles that of England during the same season.

In the rich and extensive gold district of British Columbia the mines, owing to the extreme severity of its winters, are not worked to advantage, and miners seek a more agreeable home during that season. This consideration and a general desire to render it more attractive has caused Victorians spiritedly to provide amusements in order to enjoy and profit by the society of those who would otherwise seek a pleasanter winter residence, and there is now a neat small theatre, a concert-room, several billiard-rooms, a bowling-alley, a lecture-room, a gymnasium, a philharmonic society, a horticultural society, a Freemasons' lodge, a St. Andrew's society, and numerous dinners and masons' lodge, a St. Andrew's society, and numerous dinners and masons' balls are given on board her Majesty's vessels of war. Whilst we reflect that in 1858 Victoria was a sleepy, semi-Indian village, and that then, as now, it was virtually Vancouver, and contained not more than 250 persons, the progress of its surrounding and prospects should be convincing proof that it offers satisfactory inducements to settlers.

We fear, however, that many of those who have recently flocked to Victoria are ill adapted for colonial life. Those who are wanted are wanted badly, or nearly so. Female domestics, of which latter classes but few proceed to this remote colony, owing to the length and expense of the voyage. By the latest advices Governesses could not be obtained for £8 a month, tools and food found; and female domestics were not to be had for £6 a month, with board and lodging. Nor is this state of things likely to alter for the present, as it has now prevailed for some time on the North Pacific coast. The benevolent exertions of the British Columbia Female Emigration Society are, therefore, certain to redound to the advantage of the women who proceed to the colony under their auspices, and to that of the colony itself, where they are so greatly needed.

A letter from Cantes (Turn) says:—"The tribunal of this place, at its last sitting, has cancelled the will of Father Lacordaire as far as regards a bequest given to the children of the Illuminated Asylum."

The Accesoire of Naples states that a merchant of Salerno, who called Albano, was carried off a few days ago by a party of brigands, who demanded 4000 ducats as the price for his ransom. The poor woman managed to scrape together 70 ducats and sent them to the brigands, but could not be obtained for the remainder, to the effect that his head would soon follow if the rest of the sum were not forthcoming. She applied to her friends, and succeeded in collecting the remaining 130 ducats, upon which her husband was released.

The spread of the Nonconformist principles amongst the Nonconformist special settlers appears to have been considered as important event for Auckland, a public meeting having been given to the movement by the Auckland Wesleyan Church. The immigrants were all in excellent health and spirits. Captain Wilson had taken the Government barque to the Waitemata Harbour. The great proportion of the settlers' mill on their way to the Orawahaoo block. Five near Lanes and two of the general desires to remove to their new allotments. Mr. Brogden, the work of transporting the baggage to the block was being proceeded with. Five couples were married. A smaller party had already proceeded with. Several of the emigrants have taken employment in town until such time as their services are required on their own allotments.

Now and Then has made an entirely new appearance, and is published in Paris instead of Brussels. It has been increased in size, contains six columns to the page in small print, and is sold for 50 centimes (5d.). In its programme it claims to be regarded as a cosmopolitan organ, animated exclusively by those international ideas which, it informs the world, already so far united all civilised countries that they are now adopting "the same forms of government, the same codes, the same coinage, the same weights and measures." It furthermore says that it removes to Paris because that capital is the centre of the civilised world, capable of the widest diffusion, and place its cosmopolitan character beyond doubt, the Nord prints in its first number a string of advertisements, and not a single article.

The latest measurement of those freshwater seas, the American lakes, are as follows:—The greatest length of Lake Superior is 360 miles; the greatest breadth is 160 miles; mean depth, 1027ft.; elevation, 627ft.; area, 32,000 square miles. The greatest length of Lake Michigan is 360 miles; its greatest breadth, 108 miles; mean depth, 900ft.; elevation, 587ft.; area, 20,000 square miles. The greatest length of Lake Huron is 200 miles; the greatest breadth is 160 miles; mean depth, 1020ft.; elevation, 574ft.; area, 20,000 square miles. The greatest length of Lake Erie is 250 miles; its greatest breadth is 80 miles; its mean depth is 204ft.; elevation, 309ft.; area, 6000 square miles. The greatest length of Lake Ontario is 180 miles; its greatest breadth is 60 miles; its mean depth is 500ft., 262ft.; area, 6000 square miles. The total length of all five is 1345 miles, covering an area altogether of upwards of 84,000 square miles.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

LORD MONSON.

The Right Hon. Sir William John Monson, sixth Baron Monson, of Burton-in the county of Lincoln, and a Baronet, who died in London on the 17th ult., was the only son of the Hon. Colonel William Monson, M.P. for Lincoln, by his wife, Anne, daughter of John Debonnaire, Esq., and was grandson and heir of John, second Lord Monson. He was born the 14th of May, 1796, and was educated at Christ's Church, Oxford, where he graduated M.A. in 1820. He succeeded as sixth Baron on the death of his cousin, Frederick, in 1850. Baron, the 7th of the present line of October, 1541. He married, the 8th of May, 1826, Eliza, youngest daughter of Edmund Lechmere, Esq., of Bedfordshire, by whom he had six sons and three daughters, of whom four sons and one daughter survive. The eldest son, William Monson, M.P. for Lincoln, by his wife, Anne, daughter of John Debonnaire, Esq., and was grandson and heir of John, second Lord Monson. He was born the 14th of May, 1796, and was educated at Christ's Church, Oxford, where he graduated M.A. in 1820. He succeeded as sixth Baron on the death of his cousin, Frederick, in 1850. Baron, the 7th of the present line of Monson, is married to Eliza, daughter of Edmund Lechmere, Esq., of Bedfordshire, by whom he had six sons and three daughters, of whom four sons and one daughter survive. The eldest son, William John Monson, M.P. for Lincoln, has held for ages a high position in that county. In 1811 the Baron Monson was created Knight, Master of the Harriers, and Master Falconer to James I., was created a Baronet, and his descendant, Sir John Monson, K.B., the first Lord Monson of 1728. This title became extinct on the death of the second peer, and the present Baron's second son was created Lord Sondes, and was grandfather of the present Earl Sondes; while his eldest son, John, created Lord Monson, continued the main branch, and was grandfather of the Lord Monson just deceased.

ADMIRAL SIR G. E. HAMOND, BART., G.C.B.

Sir Graham Eden Hamond, second Baronet, of Hollycombe, Sussex, G.C.B., K.C.T.S., Admiral of the Fleet, who died on the 20th ult., at his residence, Norton Priory, Freshwater, Isle of Wight, was the only child of Sir Andrew Snape Hamond, Bart., by his wife, Anne, daughter and heiress of Major Henry Graeme, of Hanwell, Middlesex, and grandson of the famous Captain Sir Andrew Snape Hamond, R.N., who, for his daring valour and efficient service during the American War, was created a Baronet on the 30th of December, 1781, Admiral Sir Graham Hamond, G.C.B., died on the 30th of December, 1779, and succeeded as second Baronet, on the death of his father, on the 12th of September, 1828. Admiral Hamond's own career was that of a very distinguished officer. He was born in 1784, and entered the navy in 1798, under the command of his cousin, Sir A. Snape Douglas. He thence removed with him to the Queen Charlotte, bearing the flag of Admiral Lord Howe, and shared in the victory of "the glorious 1st of June." He afterwards served in the Mediterranean, and was at the capture of Genoa by Admiral Hotham, in 1795, and of Toulon, in 1796. He was made a Lieutenant in 1803, being constantly employed on the Leeward Islands station, and assisting at the taking and destruction of a fourth, a ninth, and a tenth privateer, and at the capture of the Curieuse, of the Diligente, and of La Valette, he was appointed to the command of the Blanche, and in that vessel participated in the Battle of Copenhagen, in 1801. He commanded the Lively, captured off St. Mary three Spanish frigates laden with treasure, and destroyed a fourth. During a subsequent cruise in the Lively, he also captured the San Miguel, and the same day, in company with the Polyphemus, he took the Santa Brigada, after a running fight which lasted for several days and was in specie. While in command of the Victorious he assisted at the reduction of Trinidad. He was afterwards appointed, in 1810, Commander-in-Chief of the South-American station, and held that command for fourteen years. He became a Rear-Admiral in 1825, a Vice-Admiral in 1837, an Admiral in 1841, and Admiral of the Fleet on the 10th of November, 1862. He was made a C.B. in 1815, a K.C.B. in 1831, and a G.C.B. in 1847. In 1824 he was appointed Lieutenant for the Isle of Wight and for the county of Hants. Admiral Hamond married, Dec. 30, 1806, Elizabeth, daughter of John Kaines, Esq., of Penzance, Cornwall, by whom he has had two sons—the elder of whom survives him—and three daughters, of whom two have married. The younger son, Graham, is widow of the Hon. Lieutenant-Colonel F. G. Hood, Grenadier Guards, who was killed in the trenches before Sebastopol on the 18th of June, 1855, wife of William George Sneyden, Esq., of Spring-hill, Cowes, Isle of Wight. The Admiral is succeeded by his only surviving son, now Sir Andrew Snape Hamond, the third Baronet, a Captain in the Royal Navy, who was born in 1811, and married, at Oulsbridge, in 1844, Mary Ann, second daughter of the late Miles Eley, Esq., and has four sons and a daughter. This family of Hamond is of old standing in Kent, and has for centuries held considerable possessions and filled honourable offices in the Royal Navy. The aunt of the Admiral just deceased was, by her marriage with William Douglas, Esq., of Leith, mother of another eminent naval officer, Sir Andrew Snape Douglas, Captain on the "glorious 1st of June" of Howe's flag-ship the Queen Charlotte. Admiral Hamond's younger son died a Commander in the Royal Navy in 1847.

SIR MICHAEL BRUCE, BART.

Sir Michael Bruce, eighth Baronet, of Stenhouse, in the county of Stirling, whose death occurred on the 14th ult., at Scotstown, his seat in Aberdeenshire, was the eldest son of Sir William Bruce, the seventh Baronet, by his wife, Anne Colquhoun, daughter of the late Sir Archibald Fairlie, Bart. He was born on the 21st of July, 1796, and was educated at Dunfermline. He was formerly in the Bengal Civil Service. On his succession his father, as eighth Baronet, in 1837, he married, on the 10th of June, 1822, Isabella, only child and heiress of Alexander Meir, of Scotstown, by his wife, Margaret, daughter of James Gordon, Esq., of Banffshire. By this lady he has no issue, he is succeeded by his only son, Sir William Cunninghame Bruce, the ninth Baronet, born in 1831, who is a Lieutenant in the 8th Regiment, and was married on the 21st of August, 1850, Charlotte, daughter of the Hon. Walter O'Grady, K.C., and grandaughter of Standish, first Viscount Guillamore, and Baron of the Exchequer, in Ireland. This family of Bruce claims kindred with the ex-royal Swedish House of Bernadotte, whose present representative, Sir Robert de Bruce, a noble Norman who came over with the Conqueror, Sir Robert's descendant, Sir William Bruce, was created a Baronet in 1629, and was direct ancestor of the Sir Michael Bruce just deceased.

SIR MATTHEW BLAKISTON, BART.

Sir Matthew Blakiston, third Baronet, of Gibside, whose death, in his eighty-first year, occurred on the 23rd ult., within a month of that of his mother, was the eldest son of Sir Matthew Lady Blakiston, by his wife, Margaret, daughter of Sir Cuthbert Sharp, K.C., of Cosgrumme, in the county of Durham, and was the grandson of Sir Matthew Blakiston, Knight, an eminent London merchant, who was Lord Mayor of London at the coronation of George III., and who was created a Baronet on the 22nd of April, 1763. The Baronet just deceased was born in London, on the 12th of April, 1782, and succeeded his father as third Baronet on the 20th of September, 1809, and thus had the baronetcy more than half a century. He married, the 12th of April, 1810, Lucy, eldest daughter of James Mann, Esq., of Linton Place, Kent, by Lucy, his wife (daughter of Sir Horace Mann, Bart., British Ambassador at Florence for forty-six years, and his wife Lady Lucy Rich), and has had seven sons and six daughters, of whom four sons and two daughters survive him. The eldest daughter, Margaret, married, in 1837, General Sir Alexander Woodford, G.C.B., Governor of Malta; the second, Lucy, to the Rev. William Nixon Hooper, M.A., Rector of Winchester Cathedral; and the third, Caroline, to Charles Curzon of Lincoln's-inn. Sir Matthew Blakiston is succeeded by his eldest son, now Sir Matthew Blakiston, the fourth Baronet, who was born on the 15th of January, 1811. This family is a branch of the ancient house of Blakiston of Blakiston, in the county of Durham. Twice before have baronetcies (now extinct) been conferred by Royalty on the Blakiston family, one on each side of the family.

GENERAL SIR P. BAINBRIGGE, K.C.B.

General Sir Philip Bainbrigge, K.C.B., who died at St. Margaret's, near Titchfield, Hants, on the 29th ult., was the descendant of an ancient family resident in the counties of Leicester and Derby. He was the eldest son of Lieut.-Colonel Philip Bainbrigge (who was killed at the battle of Talavera, Dec. 10, 1799) and Rachel, his wife, daughter of Peter Dobree, Esq., of Boulogne, Guernsey, in which he was born, in 1786, and obtained his first commission in the 20th Regiment, in 1803. He afterwards entered the Royal Military College, High Wycombe, and on the completion of the course of study, with distinction, he was appointed Deputy Assistant Quartermaster-General to the fourth division of the army in the Peninsula, then in the case of Torres Vedras. In 1812, on the advance of the army into Spain, he was brought to head-quarters, as he had examined and made a satisfactory survey of the country over which our army was to advance, then in possession of the enemy. He was soon after appointed to the Quartermaster-General's department, obtained with the rank of Major, and continued in this position till the end of the campaign of 1814. He was at Cadiz during the siege, and at Tarragona. In the retreat from Burgos he rendered valuable service by extricating a division of the army from a critical situation. He was at Vittoria, the Pyrenees, St. Sebastian, Bilve, and Toulouse. He was made Deputy Quartermaster-General in Dublin in 1841, and attained the rank of Major-General in 1846. In 1852 he commanded the forces in the Island of Ceylon, and acted there on the re-grey general satisfaction until he left on his promotion to the rank of Lieutenant-General, in 1854. After his return home he took a deep and active interest in the volunteer movement. He was made C.B. in 1837, and K.C.B. in 1860; he received the reward for distinguished services: he was made Colonel of the 97th Connemara, in 1854; he also was for many years a member of the Royal Geographical Society. He was married, in 1841, to Mary, daughter of Joseph Fletcher, Esq., of Liverpool, by whom (who survives him) he leaves (with four daughters) three sons:—Philip John, a Lieutenant in the 97th Regiment; Joseph Henry, in holy orders; and Arthur, a Captain in the 13th Foot.

LADY FORBES.

The Right Hon. Horatia Lady Forbes, whose death occurred on the 24th ult., was the second daughter of Sir John Gregory Shaw, Bart., by Horatia Nelson Ker, by his wife, the Hon. Theodosia Monson, daughter of John, second Lord Monson, and was born on the 17th of May, 1787. She married, the 2nd of April, 1808, Lord Forbes, Premier Baron of Scotland, and a Baronet, the head and representative of the ancient and noble family of Forbes, of Pitsligo, in Aberdeenshire, and possessor of the Bruce estate, Aberdeenshire, granted to John de Forbes in the beginning of the twelfth century. Lordship was married to Lord Forbes, the stream Guards, and was at Waterloo. Her Ladyship was married to Lord Forbes on the 2nd of May, 1823, and leaves issue Horatio Courtenay, Master of Forbes, four other sons, and a daughter, Emily.

MRS. THOMSON.

Mrs. Katharine Thomson, who died at Dover of gastric fever on the 17th ult., was the widow of the late Dr. Anthony Todd Thomson and daughter of Mr. Thomas Bigsby, of Epsom, in Lincolnshire. She was well known to the public as the author of several works of biography and fiction. Her first production was a "Life of Jane Wesley," written for the Society for Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, and was much commended by Lord Brougham. A novel called "Constance," published without her name, her earliest venture in fiction; it was very successful. This and her "Life of Raleigh," and "Memoirs of the Court of Mary, Queen of Scots," and "Memoirs of the Duchess of Marlborough," gave Mrs. Thomson a prominent place amongst the list of lady authors. The former work was originally required for those desiring her material for a series of historical novels—"Anne Boleyn," "Reginald Castle," "The White Knight," "The Chevalier," and "Constance Sherwood." Mrs. Thomson published "Lives of the Jacobites," "Tracey; or the Apparition;" and "Widows and Widowers," and "Lives of the Princesses of the Royal Houses After Dr. Thomson's death, in 1849, Mrs. Thomson resided abroad for some years, and on her return to England she published two novels, "Lettice Arnold," and "Faults on both Sides," and "The Life of Villiers, Duke of Buckingham." The most favourably accepted of her later works were those written conjointly with her eldest son, "The Queen's Favourite," and "Sir Wilfrid Hudson's Secret Society," published under the pseudonym of "Grace and Philip Wharton." The third son, Mr. Bigsby Thomson, is the author of "The Art of Pleasure or Society," was entirely her own, her fellow-workers and youngest son, John Thomson, having died in the Queen's Bench prison, in 1854, aged 24, a sad shock from which his bereaved mother never quite recovered. During a long residence in Paris, Mrs. Thomson was intimate with the best of the literary

RELICS OF ST. THOMAS'S HOSPITAL.

Of the Hospital buildings in Southwark a few remain for removal, including the new south wing, the entrance-gates, lodge, &c.; and portions of the old buildings on the south side, including the entrance from St. Thomas's-street. Strange mutations have come over this spot, which for six centuries and a half had been the site of an hospital, or nearly three centuries and a half before it was refounded and endowed by the pious King Edward VI., who confirmed the gift only ten days before his death. Much injury was done to the property belonging to the establishment by the fires which took place in Southwark in 1676, 1681, and 1689, although the hospital itself suffered no damage on either occasion. The fire of 1676 consumed 500 houses in the Borough, "yet," says Hatton, "as by the particular will of Heaven, was extinguished at this hospital." However, at the close of the seventeenth century the buildings had become so much decayed that a subscription fund, to which Sir Robert Clayton, Knt., was a great benefactor, was raised to enlarge and re-edify the hospital, and the first stone of the new edifice was laid by Sir John Fleet, who was Lord Mayor in 1692. Additional buildings were raised in 1732; a new north wing in 1836, and south in 1842.

The great change took place in 1836, when the street to New London Bridge was formed, in place of the old narrow High-street, which was cleared away to the house just past the hospital site. We have a distinct recollection of the principal front of fifty years since,—the huge iron gates and stone piers, with a statuette on each of the latter—a male and female crippled patient. The gates, and the two large houses on each side, were erected by Mr. Guy, at an expense of £3000. The centre of the principal front, in the first quadrangle, was of stone, and presented a characteristic composition. On the upper story was a clock, under a circular pediment; and beneath was a niche, containing a statuette of Edward VI., with a sceptre in his right hand and the charter in his left. Lower, in niches on each side, was a man with a crutch, and a sick woman; and under them a man with a wooden leg, and a woman with her arm in a sling: the Royal arms, and this inscription:—"King Edward the Sixth, of pious memory, in the year of our Lord 1552, founded and endowed this hospital of St. Thomas the Apostle, together with the hospitals of Christ and Bridewell, in London." Hatton, in 1708, describes the Queen's arms in the pediment, pine-apples and festoons, and the figures of the cripples; besides the figure of Charity between two cripples, on the east side of the court, which had a Tuscan colonnade. After these crippled figures had been removed from the piers and niches, they were placed in the shrubbery-plots with grotesque effect.

The second quadrangle or court had St. Thomas's Church on the south side; on the east the court-room, over a Doric colonnade; and on the north the chapel for the use of the patients, where service was performed daily. In the centre of this court was placed a bronze statue of Edward VI., by Scheemakers, bearing this inscription, on one side in Latin, on the other in English:—

This Statue of King Edward the Sixth, a most excellent Prince, of exemplary piety, and wisdom above his years, the glory and ornament of his age, and the most munificent founder of this Hospital, was erected at the expense of Charles Joyce, Esq., in the year MDCCLXXXVII.

Scheemakers was a Flemish sculptor, who settled, about 1735, for many years in England, so that this statue of King Edward was one of his earliest works executed in this country. It is a very graceful impersonation of the amiable young Monarch; and the small pedestal, with his crown laid upon a cushion, is picturesque. Scheemakers also executed the bronze statue of Guy, in Guy's Hospital, and many monuments in Westminster Abbey.

The third court of the hospital was surrounded by a Tuscan colonnade, with an entablature, from which ascended a long range of Ionic pilasters. In the centre was a statue of Sir Robert Clayton, which Hatton, in 1708, describes as "curiously carved in full proportion, in the habit of Lord Mayor, with a charter in his hand, and standing on a pedestal about 6ft. high, all neatly cut in marble. The pedestal is enriched with Sir Robert's arms, supported with two Cupids, &c."

The statue had then been erected seven years. The pedestal has the following inscription, in Latin and in English:—

To Sir Robert Clayton, Knt., born in Northamptonshire, Citizen and Lord Mayor of London, President of this Hospital, and Vice President of the new Workhouse, and a bountiful Benefactor to it; a just Magistrate, and a brave Defender of the Liberty and Religion of his Country; who (besides many other instances of his charity to the poory built the Girls' Ward in Christ's Hospital; gave first towards the rebuilding of this house £500; and left by his last Will £2000 to the poor of it. This statue was erected in his lifetime by the Governors, as an Act of gratitude for their esteem of so much worth; and to preserve his memory after death, was by them beautified anno Dom. MDCLXXII.

Sir Robert Clayton, "the prodigious rich scrivener," was "the fanatick Lord Mayor" of Dryden's "Religio Laici." Sir Robert lived in sumptuous state in a house, or palace, in the Old Jewry—a magnificent residence, with a superb banqueting-room of cedar, painted with "The Historie of the Gyants' War."

Now were assembled otherwise a handful of the benefactors to the hospital; for in the noble court-room were portraits of Edward VI., William III., and Queen Anne, and Sir Robert Clayton, by Richardson. Sir Gilbert Heathcote, Sir Gerard Conyers, Sir John Eyles by Vanloo; Sir James Campbell, &c.—all Knights, and very likely extremely solemn also, of the foundation. King Edward VI. likewise founded the adjoining parish and church of St. Thomas; and there is a portrait of the King at the end of the hall, with a long and very curious Latin inscription.

Schoemakers' statue of Edward and the statue of Sir Robert Clayton have been removed to the temporary hospital at Walworth; and we doubt not that, wherever the institution may hereafter be located, to these memorials of regal and civic munificence places of honour will be duly assigned.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.—In this magnificent edifice there are more than 8500 square feet, or two acres, of leadwork exposed to the sun, the soot, and the weather; and the bad work of the dome now demands very extensive repairs. Fears also are aroused as to the effect, or tea-acres and a half, of stonework likewise exposed to the sulphurous vapours and smoke of London, to say nothing of the action of which the superficial area (including the crypt) is about twelve acres; but this suffers less since the cathedral has been properly warmed in winter. The cost, to the extent of £34,000, its total value may be estimated at £1,500,000.

NEW EXETER CHANGE.—Some of our metropolitan street architecture is doomed to very brief celebrity. Scarcely twenty years have passed since Mr. Tom Hughes's "Tadpole and Tapwell" first dined, and pineapples were first cried about the streets "a penny a slice" that New Exeter Change, the scarcely-lingering Cadogan-street to Wellington-street, rose under the hands of Mr. Sydney Smirke. We remember the fine flourishes about the polygons, and hexagons, and heptagons, and polychromatic embellishment; but a more very result could scarcely be named among our architectural fancies. The adjoining frontage, to the Strand, Gothicised by Mr. Pennethorne, is of red brick, with stone dressings, however, are more successful. The New Change is now in course of removal, is having failed in almost every thing save notoriety, and "for the Lacote Mr. Fuller." The arcade, with its soltariness, we can spare; the quaint frontages deserve a longer existence.

A CHRISTMAS DINNER AT ALBION SCHOOLROOM, ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE.

A large dinner-party assembled on the 23th ult. within the walls of these magnificent schools, including upwards of 500 persons connected with Albion Chapel and its Sunday-schools sat down to the good old English fare of roast beef and plum-pudding, which was provided at the expense of the Sunday-school superintendents. There were 20 rounds of beef, 210 plum-puddings, 4 loads of potatoes, and 100 lb. loaves, provided for the occasion Christmas party. The room bore quite a festive appearance with its flags and banners of every hue; and the welcome words, "A Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year to you all!" were to be seen on banners. Just as the last dittuy on the instruments played during the dinner; and, after full justice had been done to the contents of the baskets, the meeting was called to order.

Mr. Mason, who presided, made a spirited speech. He said:—"Can any one deny that this is a glorious night to behold? To-day let us forget the troubles of the past, for the day is the very birthday of peace; and while at other times I would commend with all my heart prudence, economy, and foresight, to-day I say, 'Let us make merry, and be glad,' and I wish you from my heart of hearts a merry Christmas and a happy new year. To-day let us forget boards of guardians, relief committees, and gaywagging. I think it is proper and fitting on an occasion like the present to meet together as we are doing to-day and forget our animosities, the faults of the past, and the misunderstandings, and to do all we can to cheer each other's spirits and to excite each other's hopes. I ask you, my friends, are you not proud of your country, and of your manufactures? Who would have thought that the operatives of Lancashire would have evolved such a glorious spirit of kindness from the very depths of misery, from the lowest depths of all, and back down to the humblest factory worker, as this great crusis of ours has done? Yes, I am proud of my country, and let us be proud above all of the county of Lancashire. And if there is one thing more than another of which we have a right to be proud, it is the exhibition of the manly and Christian feeling which has been displayed, intelligent, loyal spirit of the working classes of Lancashire.

You are assembled here not to listen to speeches; but it did seem appropriate that a few words of encouragement should be spoken, and a few words of kindly sympathy expressed on behalf of those who have suffered so much during the past twelve months. If there be one thing more than another in which I rejoice, it is that feeling which we have seen to exist between the employer and employed in the quarrel of our friends on the other side of the Atlantic, and to which it mainly owing the distress at this particular time. I have got one thing to thank God for, and that is that the rich and people, that it would have immensely increased our difficulties and troubles if we had had to contend at the slightest degree with the private quarrels of the American people. I know we all heartily wish for the termination of this quarrel, not on the ground that we are suffering, but on the ground of humanity and Christian feeling, and that we shall not cease to pray that the bloodshed may be stopped, and that peace may be restored between the two great free nations of the continent."

Several glees followed the speech, and baskets full of apples and oranges were handed round. The Rev. J. G. Rogers, B.A., minister of Albion-street Chapel, afterwards addressed the assembly. Mr. Mason then proposed the health of Lancashire chairman, Mr. Bright, which was heartily responded to. After three cheers for the ladies, who had assisted so materially at the entertainment, the assembly separated.

Mr. Hugh Mason, who presided, is the only millowner whose factory is working full time. It was most touching his allusion to it when the dinner was given. He is an influential and active member of the Central Relief Committee in Manchester as well as of the Borough Relief Committee of Ashton-under-Lyne.

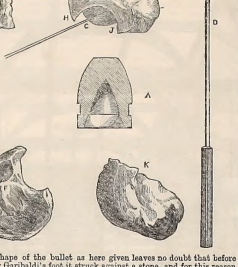
Two letters have been received in Glasgow from Garibaldi. They contain a message from the General's deep gratitude to the English people for remembering him at a period when sympathy was doubly welcome to him.

Mr. Sydney Whiting has lately received from the Prussian Government, through the Prussian and Zollverein commissioners, a magnificent gold medal, struck at the Berlin collection, in testimony of their expressive of their appreciation of the great assistance rendered by Mr. Whiting in his capacity of editor of the official catalogue.

The Monde gives the following details relative to the works for restoring the cupola on the Church of the Holy Sepulchre:—The French architect and the one sent by Russia—a German by birth and a Protestant—have made a minute examination of the present state of the cupola. They have ascertained that all the woodwork is so worm-eaten that at the first heavy squall of wind the top of the cupola might fall on the tomb of the Saviour. The architects propose, in the first place, to construct a scaffolding covering as a protection for pilgrims and the clergy from any accident. As to the cupola itself, every one has long agreed as to the necessity of it; it is said, be constructed in bronze."

THE BULLET IN GARIBALDI'S ANKLE.

DR. RYAN, who, it will be remembered, was in attendance professionally on Garibaldi whilst the General was laid up with a broken ankle, has obligingly forwarded to us some drawings (herewith engraved), accompanied by the following particulars relating to the bullet found in the wound, and elucidatory of the reason why its presence there had been of such little consequence.



"The shape of the bullet as here given leaves no doubt that before entering Garibaldi's foot it struck against a stone, and for this reason its originally conical form (A) was changed into that presented in the Engraving. To strengthen this opinion there is the fact that, when the bullet was extracted from the wound, it was found to want more than four grammes, when compared with the weight of an ordinary conical (Bersaglieri) bullet. It is also evident that the bullet thus shaped entered by breaking the internal malleolus exactly at his sharpest edge (B), making a triangular wound; and that it slightly touched the tibia in its articulation with the astragalus, and a little above it. By the position thus described it will appear that the ordinary speculum used by Professors Partridge, Ripari, and others passed under the neck formed by the bullet, and did not allow of its being felt, as is apparent in the Engraving at letter C. It was only when Mr. Partridge's speculum (D) was used that the button (E) struck the bullet (F), carrying away a black substance which, on being analysed, proved to be lead. The first out by Professor Ripari's speculum (G) was from a sharp edge (I), and by the pressure exercised by the knife the bullet was pushed inside. The doubt of the presence of the bullet in the wound is thus explained. A further obstacle to the determining whether the bullet was still in the foot was presented by the little bone (G), which barred the bottom of the wound across the two points of the letter H and J. This bone was only removed when Dr. Basile introduced into the wound the bit of sponge to facilitate the subsequent extraction of the projectile."

BAZAAR IN AID OF THE SCOTTISH INSTITUTION FOR IMBECILE CHILDREN.

A BAZAAR of ladies' work and other articles, in aid of the funds of the Scottish Institution for Imbecile Children, has recently been held in the Music Hall, Edinburgh, and was attended with the most gratifying success. The new institution on behalf of which this effort was made is at present in course of erection at Larbert, in Stirlingshire. A sum of about £9000 has already been raised, but it is hoped that the proceeds of this bazaar would be sufficient to meet the expenses of that portion of the building now in progress, and that afterwards there would be contributed, by annual subscription, what funds may be required for maintaining that part of the institution. The building, when fully completed, will be capable of containing 200 inmates, and of that number it is intended that two-thirds shall be maintained at the public expense. The first portion of the premises is expected to be ready for occupancy in spring, and another portion will be opened in the ensuing summer.

The object being thus of a philanthropic character it was no wonder that, during the three days the bazaar was held, the hall was thronged by a crowd of fashionable company, and that very large sales were effected. The decorative arrangements were carried out under the superintendence of Mr. Bonnycastle, and the various stalls were fitted up around the hall in a very tasteful manner, each being distinguished by a coloured scroll bearing the name of the lady who presided and conducted the sales, and separated from the adjoining by a shield surmounted by national flags. The orchestra was similarly decorated.

The articles contributed to the bazaar were arranged in a style different from anything to which the public had hitherto been accustomed on similar occasions. The usual arrangement was to a certain extent classified, instead of, as formerly, each stall being much the same as those adjoining it in regard to the description of its contents. The principal stall, at which the Countess of Haddington presided, assisted by Lady Bingham, was devoted to the display of foreign manufactures. The articles contributed were received from the interior of China, Japan, India, Canada, America, Germany, and other countries. The next stall contained "articles of furniture," with some excellent specimens of sewed work, and was presided over by Mrs. Simpson, Portobello. The adjoining one, at the end of the hall, exhibited about 1000 ornamental articles of "vertu," with some excellent specimens of sewed work, and was presided over by Mrs. Simpson, Portobello. The adjoining one, at the end of the hall, exhibited about 1000 ornamental articles of "vertu," with some excellent specimens of sewed work, and was presided over by Mrs. Monzies, containing dolls and other toys, then came Mrs. Dunn's, devoted to children's dresses; then Mrs. Thomson Carmichael's, miscellaneous; next, that of Mrs. Keith Johnston, containing articles of clothing for the poor. On the opposite side of the hall the first stall reserved it was that presided over by Mrs. Guthrie and Mrs. Irving, of Falkirk, at which were displayed the fancy productions of female industry, chiefly of sewed work—and baskets of artificial flowers and fruit. Adjoining it was Mrs. A. Thomson's, containing baskets, "cosies," and sewed work; then Mrs. Bruce Gardyne's, articles of the same sort, that of Mrs. Romanes, on which, besides the children's dresses announced on the cards, were some interesting ecclesiastical specimens, and a considerable herbarium of British ferns; next, a stall for game and dairy produce, presided over by Mrs. Foster, Abbotsford Park; then Mrs. Archer's stall, exhibiting a miscellaneous collection of articles; and, finally, a stall for worsted work, under the charge of Mrs. Campbell, Newington. The refreshments were abundantly provided by Messrs. David Doull and Co. It may be mentioned that the credit of the tasteful, orderly, and convenient arrangement of the contents of the respective stalls was due, we understand, almost entirely to Mrs. Davidson, Abbotsford Park, Merchiston (the secretary), and to Miss Anderson, Langton Villa, Grange, whose exertions greatly contributed to the success of the bazaar.

A substantial addition is about being made to the ranks of the baronetage. We understand (says the Globe) that in the course of a few days an official notification will be made that her Majesty has conferred this distinction upon six gentlemen. They are—Mr. William Brown, of Liverpool; Mr. Frank Crossley, of Halifax, M.P. for the West Riding; Mr. David Barker, of Doncaster; Mr. Edward Ellice, M.P. for the Coast of Coromandel Assembly of New South Wales; Mr. Henry Rich, for many years a conservative Member of Liberal opinions, and Chairman of Committees; and Mr. Thomas Davies Lloyd, of Bronwydd, a Welsh gentleman of ancient lineage, well known and popular throughout the Principality.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

IN more than one instance we have of late had the inquiry forced upon us —what is a Druid? Of course one means the interrogatory to apply to this, the nineteenth century, and not to that period when the Druids were the British priesthood. A few months since we were called upon in a critical capacity to say something about a book which addressed itself to the sporting world, and which professed to be the production of "The Druid;" and though in many parts full of interest, much of it was as mystical to us uninitiated as would be a manuscript containing the translation of the sacred graves at the period when Caractacus (the Prince, not the Derby horse) flourished. Again, last week, one finds a Cabinet Minister holding revel with an assembly of Druids at Oxford, when he addresses by titles as high-sounding as any that the original ancient priests could have invented, but as far as we can make out, whose lodging himself to be one of the mysterious fraternity with which he was surrounded. In this he uttered those caw-me-caw-thee sentences which members are prone to lavish on their constituents. However, given the Druids—whatever they are—the question for discussion here is the inter-connection between the Right Hon. Edward Cardwell, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and a member of the Cabinet, and the election of Oxford. When such a gentleman pronounces in public, those who go to listen to him and the pearls of information to drop from his lips; and no previous experience induces them to leave that they will learn absolutely nothing. Of all men and members in being, Mr. Cardwell is perhaps as good at delivering a speech, and learning by heart every topic on which he touches, not exactly where it was before, but rather enveloped in greater haziness. A specially rectangular pupil of Peel, he has brought to the art of verbosity in his practice to a climax. To hear him answer a question or give an explanation you fancy you have the full force of the French satirist's estimate of the pleader who commenced his oration with the creation of the world; you understand how it has been said that language was invented to conceal man's thoughts. You can imagine the way of person who has been described as unable to take a cup of tea without a stratagem; and yet all the while Mr. Cardwell is conveying information of such plummet which was to sound the intellectual and political wells which are ostentatiously exhibited before you would not have to go very deep. If you can realise a mere exposition on the Athanasian principle, but mightily diluted, delivered in a way which suggests that the Apostles' Creed has been put into a parliamentary form, a conventicle and forced to intone after the manner which is adopted by a certain sect in the Church, you have the eloquence of the Chancellor of the Duchy complete. Whilst Mr. Cardwell has displayed an official aptitude for sinking. In 1853 he was President of the Board of Control for India. Numbers, and earned some reputation in that department; and when Lord Palmerston came in with his Coalition Government Mr. Cardwell, being a supporter of the Premier, was put into a berth—that is, Mr. Milner Gibson, who was to be conciliated, declining to be Governor-General of India, was taken by Mr. Cardwell's place. For some time he was supposed to be managing very well, and it was whispered that he had caught inspiration from the blarney-stone, which made him a bigger lion than Macready. When the home secretaryship became vacant, on Sir George Lewis's going to the War Office, the most sanguine of outsiders could not understand, Mr. Cardwell lapsed from the home secretaryship to the Duchy of Lancaster, and a Minister who, if he has any merit at all, possesses that of indefinite willingness to work, was relegated to a sinecure place. The reason why was not, he became so feeble mentally as he does the multitude at the Oxford Druids, who are probably up to this time trying to discover what his speech to them the other day was about.

There seems to have been considerable, on the part of the electors of Stroud towards Mr. Horsman. Not so long ago a deputation of that body intimated to the latter gentleman a break in the chain of continuity between member and constituents; to which he curtly replied that he had no experience of such a thing. Now, however, Mr. Horsman is in happy and pleasant communication with those whom he is supposed to represent, or, at any rate, the malcontents did not show their teeth at the recent assemblage at which they were described as Britons. Possibly the Stroudians may have discovered that which some other persons thought they saw in the course of a speech by Mr. Horsman last Session. There was much greater existence than usual on his part—that is to say, his speeches were few and far between, and their tone more moderate. It was as if the member had resolved that one knight venture to hint such a thing, one would say that there were indications, from the Parliamentary career of Lord Palmerston, that there was less leaning towards that anomalous Radicalism, which rather pronounced for Lord Derby than not, than was evinced in former years. If one was sanguine enough to insinuate that perhaps some of this change may have been the result of Parliamentary chastening; for, unless one's memory greatly deceives one, it is the first occasion that in the Session of 1861 there were occasions when two-thirds of Mr. Horsman's addresses were spoken to empty benches. Often it happened that while Mr. Horsman was speaking work himself up into a climax, which was taken to be a peroration, and a very effective one too, lost; and the orator would find that they should be in the state of titillation which careful orators use to their advantage, having a wise sense of favours to come; when, lo! he would take breath and start off with a sentence which would open a new speech, and particularly came, and everybody as inevitably walked off. Nevertheless, we take it that one of the best services a person can do to a great speech from Mr. Horsman, in which he runs amuck against all and sundry, no party or statesman being able to get quite out of his way.

Time was when Mr. Bernal Osborne was peculiarly useful to the House. It was the privilege of the constituency of Cottonopolis to help up a dreary debate by exposing the platitudes of the Treasury Bench, and to make Democracy incarnate in Parliament in the persons of Messrs Bright and Milner Gibson. Now Manchester is content to be represented in its more mature years by sending to the House whatever two men of their town and trade, pure and simple, who—if what one hears be true—are remarkable chiefly for their reticence, and who in their way are as much arbiters of commercial affairs in their own city as Rothschild and Baring are in London. Practical men—men of good sense and business habits, who mind their own work. Mr. Bazley and Mr. Aspinall Turner occupy excellent positions in the House. Mr. Aspinall Turner is a gentleman who rarely rises to speak; but in both instances, and especially in that of Mr. Bazley, whose recent appearance at a meeting of his constituents in Manchester has been called forth by the attacks, they are a source of strength. Mr. Bazley is one of the most assiduous attendants at the sittings of the House. Having devoted considerable attention to a particular subject, his handsome benevolent face and his manly form may be seen at all hours or most hours of the day seeking information. On his return to Manchester Mr. Bazley is accepted as an authority; and anything he would have to say thereon would be regarded carefully by statesmen of all parties.

We have heard a good deal of Conservative reaction of late. The waning of a few members of Parliament who were formerly considered Conservatives, but who invariably declare that they have no desire to disturb Lord Palmerston, has enabled those members of the Opposition who would like to disturb him if they could to assert that they sympathise with them. However this may be, it does not seem to be of much consequence for the policy of Ministries nowadays is so much defined that it matters little by what name those who govern men and guide the State call themselves. Still, it is rather interesting to witness an attempt at reaction in Sussex, and which, that which has hitherto been confined to words. The public assemblage at a society service of Conservatives, the Duke of the Conservatives to power, although it has its birth in that part of England of which a sarcastic lawyer said that the latter is seen to wear the better he understood why the wise men came from the east, may mean something. Nay, at Torquay, where the Devonshire members have been out-speaking from their point of view, there lay hid the Arch-Conservative himself, and if it did not suit Mr. Disraeli to appear while the lesser puppets were exhibiting, it is not too much to suppose that he had was not very far off from the strings. Once and again it has been our painful task to distaste, according to our judgment, that rising statesman, Sir Stafford Northcote, and on this occasion it is not our purpose to say much of his speech, which, as the leading banner of the Conservative creed, and the recorder of the deeds of that party, he maintained the reputation which he has gained in the House. Filling up platitude on platitude, he culminated to a definition, which, if it means anything, means that the Opposition is only capable of showing its teeth when it is in the Session, and that must be at a moment's strength once a week in the Session, and that must be at a morning and not at an after-dinner sitting. Now, if Sir Lawrence Palk, who is a mournfully-earnest member, had said this, no one would have minded it; or if Mr. Kekewich, a very pleasant, gentlemanly, and sensible man, had so delivered himself, it might have been thought that he had meant to perpetrate a joke. But, coming from a prominent Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a minuted leg of his party, proximate Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a minuted leg of his party, proximate Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a minuted leg of his party, proximate

THE WRECK OF THE COLOMBO.

In a previous Number we announced the loss of the mail-steamer Colombo. This vessel, one of the fine fleet of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, was 2107 gross tonnage, and of 450-horse power, classed A 1 in Lloyd's register, and built in 1853. She was bringing the Australian, China, and Calcutta mails, when, on Nov. 19, she went ashore on one of the southernmost of the Laccadives, known as Minicoy Island, 447 miles from Point de Galle. By the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steam-ship Massilia we have received full particulars of the loss of the Colombo. Owing to the thickness of the weather, no observations could be taken after leaving Galle, and on the morning of Nov. 19, at four o'clock, the weather continuing very thick, nothing being visible at a ship's length and the rain coming down in torrents, speed was reduced to "half slow." Two hours afterwards breakers ahead were reported a quarter of a mile off; and before the engines, which were immediately reversed, could have any effect on the vessel, she forged ahead, and the swell and a strong wind drove her bodily on the coral beach. She touched so lightly that no one on board felt the shock. There was a strong current to the northward at the time of about three miles an hour. After striking, she fell over to windward, exposing her deck to the sea, which poured down the hatchways and skylights in torrents. As nothing could be done to save the ship, the boats on the land side were cleared, and by eight a.m. all the passengers and crew were safely landed. A drenching rain continued, which was the more felt as most of the ladies and children were lightly clad. Awnings and spars were brought on shore, and by two p.m. the passengers were comfortably housed until better accommodation could be obtained at the village, a short distance off, where they repaired the next day and took up their abode until the arrival of assistance. A native boat, with an officer, was sent to the nearest land, 210 miles distant, to telegraph the news of the disaster to Bombay, Galle, and Calcutta. An abundance of provisions was obtained from the wreck. On Nov. 30 the Ottawa arrived from Bombay and took the passengers to Suez. Eighteen hours after striking the ship parted in two pieces, midships. The disaster appears to have been occasioned by insufficient allowance having been made for the strength of the current, which, notwithstanding a mile and a half an hour had been allowed for it, drove the vessel some 32 miles out of her course. The passengers speak in great praise of the presence of mind shown by Captain Farquhar under the trying circumstances, and his unwearied exertions for their comfort and convenience. A short time before the disaster Captain Farquhar had succeeded in saving a vessel from shipwreck.

The following description of the Island of Minicoy is taken from Horsburgh's Directory:—"Minicoy or Malicoy Island (the centre) in lat. 8 deg. 17 min. N., long. 73 deg. 7 min. E., is about six miles and a half in length, and half a mile in breadth, extending in the form of a crescent from N.E. to S.W., with the concave side to the N.W., where a circular coral-reef projects about three miles, and is joined to the extremes of the island on the reef near the west point of the island. There is an inlet with trees on it, an l at the north end of the island there is a passage through the reef, with two fathoms—the deepest water—through which the boats and small vessels pass; but it is narrow and intricate. When the boats are within the reef, the water is deeper—two and a quarter and three fathoms, over a bottom of hard coral; but chains would be necessary to secure a vessel were there any swell. This island is very populous, and the natives are hospitable. It is well planted with cocoanut-trees, and may be seen from the deck of a large ship about three and a half or four leagues." It is, doubtless, on the coral-reef mentioned that the vessel struck.

NEW LUNATIC ASYLUM AT ABERDEEN.

ST. PAUL'S INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS, STALYBRIDGE.

These schools are held in rooms provided in his mill by Robert Platt Esq., who, although his own hands are fully employed, as he has never ceased working full time, yet has kindly given these rooms for the benefit of those who are out of work. One of our Engravings represents a part of the shoemaking class at work. Here the men are taught by a shoemaker, himself out of work, to make and mend shoes. This is very popular with the young men. They have already repaired, free of cost, one hundred and twenty-one pairs of shoes belonging to those who attend the female and male schools, and it is intended to repair gratis the shoes of all amongst them needing repair. In another Engraving we have the old men in school, with spectacles on nose, poring over book, or copy, or slate. The oldest scholar here is seventy-nine years of age. The quietness and docility of these men, rough as many of them appear to be, are very remarkable, and quite touching. A drillmaster attends twice a week, and a singing-master attends on the alternate two days. The taste for music is most remarkable.

ROYAL LUNATIC ASYLUM, ABERDEEN.

This institution provided, originally, accommodation of a mixed class—viz., paupers and boarders. The managers, undertaking in terms of the Lunacy Act to provide accommodation for the whole paupers of the county, resolved to erect a detached establishment for boarders, of which the accompanying Engraving represents the south-east aspect, and to convert the original buildings into a pauper asylum. The building is erected on an elevated situation, commanding an extensive view of the surrounding country, about two miles from the centre of Aberdeen. The pleasure-grounds are extensive, beautifully wooded, and laid out in terraces, drives, &c., the extent in all being about twenty-four acres. Internally, the accommodation is most complete, and of a nature which, while it precludes the idea of restraint or confinement, is at the same time in accordance with perfect safety to the inmates. It is also varied, so that a patient may have a suite of apartments for complete privacy, or may live in the common rooms with the others. The building was erected under the charge of Mr. Ramage, architect, Aberdeen. The cost of the building, including furnishings, was about £11,000. The number of boarders who can be accommodated in it is sixty-six.

MESSRS. YATES AND POWER'S ENTERTAINMENT.

The Egyptian Hall is now the locale where Mr. Edmund Yates and Mr. Harold Power's "Invitations" are accepted by a numerous body of friends. These invitations, as our readers are well aware, are illustrated by scenes from the exquisite pencil of Mr. William Beverley. One of these we have selected this week, the beauty of which will doubtless secure general approbation. It is representative of the seaside. As to the entertainment itself, it has been thoroughly successful with the public, who have welcomed it as in some sort a revival of the pleasing style of lecturing which the late Mr. Albert Smith so successfully introduced. There are great diffrunons, however, between the two, nor always to the disadvantage of the new candidates. Their youth and associations are greatly in their favour, and they are both capable of sketching off character with the happiest effect. As public déinestors, who have proposed "to catch the manners living as they rise," they have a wild field of artistic labour before them, which we have no doubt will render up much of its fruit to their use in the selection and execution of their future subjects. Their present invitations are very acceptable: those yet to be expected will probably be more so. They have commenced well, and their progress is among the recorded facts of the season.

No. 1184.—VOL. XLII. SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 1863. TWO SHEETS, FIVEPENCE

THE SPEECH OF THE EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH.

THE position and the power of France have always given and must always give her a peculiar weight in the affairs of Europe. At no time more than the present is it an admitted fact, however little pleasing it may be to the pride of other nations, that the occasions on which the ruler of France is expected to pronounce publicly and formally, whether in the shape of a curt sentence to an Ambassador or in a set speech to his Chambers, are looked forward to with a marked sense of their importance to the tranquillity of the world. When the reception of the diplomatic body on New-Year's Day has passed over without the enunciation of anything beyond courteous commonplaces, expectation turns to the probabilities of what will be the tone of the address of the Emperor to his senators and deputies. For a long time previously the likelihoods of that speech have been canvassed all over the Continent with so much eagerness as to lead to the belief that there are few who do not think that in it are involved the issues of peace and war; and when it has been delivered, and it is found to contain no sensational paragraph, nothing on which the phantom of an offence could be fastened, and merely fulfils that formal if not meaningless character which is taken to belong to set regal declarations, a long sigh of relief passes over the European States, and it is assumed that the business of the world may go on for the ensuing year. Far be it from us to insinuate that anybody has been alarmed; but the acknowledgment of the passing away of a political crisis if tacit is universal.

If any special expectations were formed with regard to the speech of the Emperor to his Chambers this year his Imperial Majesty, who has a talent for surprises, has certainly disappointed them. Any notion that a programme for the future, so far as it is comprehended in the next twelve months, would be laid down has been effectually dissipated. The Speech is a retrospect, a review of the results of the last five years of the second empire, with an infusion of congratulation and laudation which is exhibited so judiciously as at once to gratify the self-consciousness of Frenchmen and to avoid wounding the most delicate susceptibilities of other countries. Most, if not all, of the results to France to which the Emperor lays claim are undeniable. In the gross they amount to an assertion that she has gained rather than lost ground as a nation, and that her attitude and status in the world are to all appearances assured.

There is something of a personal disclaimer in that early sentence of the Speech in which the Emperor hints at the aptness of people to seek in the acts of Sovereigns hidden motives and mysterious combinations, and it would seem as if he meant to proclaim that, in the sentiments which his Speech contains, this time at least, he has no after-thoughts and no mental reservations. Without this most of us would probably be ready to accept the assertion that his policy has been simply to increase the prosperity of France and her moral ascendancy. Of the success of his policy in the latter respect there can be no doubt; and we are not prepared categorically to affirm that nothing has been done which has contributed to the prosperity of France. Taken in connection with that paragraph which tells of the conclusion of negotiations of treaties of commerce with other nations, such an assertion is to a considerable extent borne out, and we in this country at least ought not, indeed cannot be, disposed to gainsay any policy which tends to enlarge the capabilities of a people for that trading and commercial interchange on which is founded our own material prosperity.

It is to the last five of the ten years of the second empire that the Emperor points as having especially produced those results which have, as he believes, added to the stability of his dynasty and the extension of the influence of France in her foreign relations, as well as her advance in material improvement. It is insinuated with some skill that during that period a pure despotism has been tempered down to a point which almost touches constitutionalism; and a notable example of the extension of the power of the Legislative Body is adduced in the fact that the Executive has abandoned one of its prerogatives by intrusting to the Chambers the determination of proper scope and limits of national expenditure. However shadowy and meagre the reality of this sketch of the growth of what, for want of a better word, we must call the advance of popular institutions in France may seem in our eyes, yet it must be confessed that in point of efficiency as a defence it has been wanting; and, if the French people are called upon to be thankful for small mercies, and are content therewith, it is not for other folk to criticise and condemn their condition.

When an Imperial manifesto like that which has just been promulgated is carefully framed on the principle of declaring nothing for certain which can be made to answer and to deal with it can only do so in its own sense, and, that being purely historical, comment descends almost to verbal criticism. Proceeding with the points of the speech from this point of view, one is led to observe on the lightness of hand with which the question of Mexico is touched, and with what ingenuity its object is made to appeal to a pervading feeling of the people of France—their national honour and their military prestige. The settlement of the long-disputed question with Switzerland of the right of territory in the Vallée des Dappes is, perhaps, the one subject which in the European interest, independent of pride and of complications which might at any time have led to hostile demonstrations under circumstances in which other Powers could scarcely have been in a position to stand by and look on. On his Italian policy the Emperor has touched with singular abstinence, and he only indicates that the acknowledgment of France has at once vindicated the independence of Italy and the inviolability of the temporal sovereignty of the Pope—a reconciliation of an anomaly which is not equally clear to every one else besides his Majesty, and which is not traced in his speech by any logical process. One intimation may be deduced from this part of his statement, and it is to connect the only index of future policy which it contains—namely, that no intention exists in his mind at present to make any alteration in the status quo at Rome.

Perhaps the most frank declaration which the Emperor makes is that which relates to his views on the question of mediation in the quarrel between the contending States of America. He avows that he has been for some time ready to interpose with an offer of mediation, and has been only restrained by the decided opposition to such a course adopted by the other maritime Powers of Europe, without whose co-operation he tacitly admits that action on his part might not have been successful. He intimates that a favourable opportunity may arise he will be ready to offer his friendly offices to the Americans, even if he does so alone. There are not wanting those who have insinuated that the establishment of a large French force in Mexico was but a preliminary to some such step on his part of the Emperor, whose diplomatic action, he may be supposed to think, would not be the less forcible from the fact that something like an army was disposable almost on the American frontier. It is only fair, in discussing this portion of the Emperor's policy, to admit that reasons springing from other than mere political ambition may have mainly influenced his conduct and his wishes. The pressure on that manufacture which depends on the American cotton supply is felt keenly in France, and no one knows better than Louis Napoleon the social dangers which lurk in the haunts of the unemployed workmen of that country. It is with a view to meet for awhile this peril that, if he is unable to hold out hopes of his being able to bring peace to America, he proposes a grant of public money applicable to the mitigation of the distress which the cotton famine is causing.

It may, perhaps, be observed that while there is no special mention of the alliance with England which has hitherto generally been thought worthy of a sentence in the Imperial Speech, there are half a dozen significant words relative to the reconstruction of the navy of France, which are of interest to this country. That matter is spoken of almost as if it was an accomplished fact; and if one were inclined to seek for large suppositions beneath scanty expressions, the phrase might be construed into an intimation that the design of maritime equality, if not of supremacy, of which the Emperor has been so often accused, is not laid aside or disregarded. If we were to venture to give an opinion we should say that this boasted reconstruction of the navy, which, of course, means the introduction of armour-plated vessels of war, is intended to be carried out as has been found necessary to stop short, and that ere long there will come a reaction on the subject of the construction and armaments of fighting-ships which will render it necessary that another reconstruction of the navies of the world should be commenced.

Taking a general and comprehensive view of the document, on the issue of which so much expectation has been founded, it may be said that it has disappointed that expectation, but to our conception in an agreeable manner. From its tone may be deduced the conclusion that for some time to come the empire is to be tolerably peace; and if there be any who would found on indications are given of the activity of France in the affairs of the world, we think it can be asserted that the world prefers the unambitious course which has been pursued.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Chambers were opened, on the 12th inst., with the usual ceremony, in the Salle des Cent Gardes, at the Palace of the Emperor at Paris. It was well received, and, as will be seen from the translation of it given in another column, was pronounced by the Times

After the ceremony of opening the Chambers a dinner of forty-two covers was given at the Tuileries, at which there were present all the members of the Imperial family and the officers of the Cent Gardes and of the Guides, who had served as the escort, were present. At half-past nine there was a ball, at which the court numbered about 450. Their Majesties entered the salons at ten. The Empress wore a dress of sky-blue satin, splendidly trimmed, and a magnificent parure of diamonds and rubies.

The Corps Législatif was opened on the 13th inst. by its President, the Duke de Morny. The Duke eulogised the Emperor's Address, and expressed his hopes that the Deputies would not lose sight of the fact inculcated in the Address, that their language and attitude must have a constant

ITS RECEPTION.

The Federal Generals in the South seem to interpret the proclamation each according to his own views. Thus, General Sutton, the adjutant-general of Florida, who has addressed the people of Louisiana, informing them "that the changes suggested therein" do not take effect on the 1st of January, nor at any precise period. No public demonstration will be allowed, and the slaves are advised to remain on their plantations "until their privileges shall have been definitively established." Nor will they be allowed to take the law into his own hands. Coloured soldiers are to be put under surveillance, and neither allowed to make nor receive visits. No fugitives will be entertained in their quarters, but no encouragement is to be given to the slaves to leave their masters.

General Butler's proclamation has already received a number of fugitives, and in Norfolk the freed men have celebrated the great event. They met together on the last day of the year, and listened to addresses from their own orators. Headed by a band of music, they paraded through the principal streets of the city. They carried several Union flags, and cheered loudly for emancipation.

WAR NEWS.

The army of the Potomac is still inactive.

On the left wing a battle commenced between General Rosecrans's army and that commanded by Generals Joseph Johnston and Bragg. The battle took place near Murfreesboro', in Tennessee. It lasted two days, and at the close the Confederates still held their intrenched positions within which they had been driven on the first day's fight. The losses were very heavy. Three Federal Generals were wounded, and the Confederate Generals Cheatham and Rains were killed. The latter was a brother of Mrs. Gen. Price, who is said to have none but Federal reports of this battle.

The Richmond papers say that the Federals attacked Vicksburg on the 27th, 28th, and 29th ult., and were repulsed each time.

THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

The Richmond Whig contains a violent article upon England for refusing to accept the Confederate position proper. It says, that "England could have made fast friends with the South, but that time has now gone by for ever."

General Banks has superseded General Butler at New Orleans. The latter has been recalled to Washington at the instance of the French Government. Banks has issued an address to the people of New Orleans defending his proceedings by reference to severities practised in Mexico and French Guiana in the last three centuries. He alludes to Great Britain and France "as the most polished and the most hypocritical nations of Europe," and boasts that, though he may be cursed in the salon, he will be blessed in the cottage.

WASHINGTON.

The President has signed the bill admitting Western Virginia as a separate State.

Mr. Smith of Indiana, Secretary of the Interior, and not Attorney-General of Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet, has resigned his office, presumably because of his disapproval of the emancipation policy.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The New York Chamber of Commerce has passed resolutions to the effect that the war against American commerce carried on by Alabama is not rebuked by the British press, nor the fitting out of vessels armed for war by the Government, and that the American merchants in the rise of freights are subject, to a certain extent, to the evils which would attend a state of war with England, which England enjoys the advantage of. The Committee was appointed to report what action the Chamber shall take in the matter.

Mr. Thurlow Weed has been appointed Governor of New York. He made a speech declaring that he would uphold the State Constitution and see to it that the laws were respected; that his position gave him the right to be consulted upon the policy that kept the Union would be one and indivisible before his term of service expired. His first act was the removal of the New York Police Board Commissioners and Superintendent Kennedy, for permitting the use of the New York Police Station for the illegal detention of citizens.

The Governor's annual message, just issued, has recommended the passage of an act providing for the gradual abolition of slavery in that State. He also advocates the raising of a gigantic revenue. The State Legislature is strongly in favour of carrying out the same policy, the only question being whether the Governor's plan is sufficiently speedy in its operation.

Captain Wynn, of the British Army, had been arrested in Baltimore, on his arrival from England, on the charge of acting as an emissary of the Confederates. His companion, another British officer, was not interfered with.

The Great Eastern was to have left New York for England on the 3rd, but, in consequence of a heavy fog, the pilot advised that she should be detained for a few hours longer.

A despatch from St. Paul, Minnesota, states that thirty-eight Indians, implicated in the massacres, the massacre, were hung at Mankato, on the morning after Christmas Day, and that the gallows was so constructed that all fell at once.

AUSTRALIA.

MELBOURNE, Nov. 26.

PARLIAMENT was opened on the 7th inst. by his Excellency Sir Henry Barkly, whose speech on the occasion was of the usual negative character of such effusions. The only thing of any importance in the Governor's speech was the advised attempt was made to oust the Ministry, the result of which, however, will tend to strengthen and perpetuate certainly the term over which the present government.

The Land Act passed last Session has been found to be so defective in its construction as to give great facilities for squatters and speculators getting possession of the best of the land in the place on the outskirts of towns. Ministers admitted the defects and promised to introduce a short bill to remedy them, and until that was passed they had suspended the selection clauses of the measure. On the evening of the 24th inst. the annual meeting of the Victorian Acclimatisation Society took place, when a good attendance of members were interested in the work, as well as a sprinkling of the fair sex, amongst whom was Lady Barkly, the Governor's wife, who occupied a seat on the left of the chair of his speech paid a well-merited compliment to Mr. Edward Wilson, to whose indefatigable exertions, not only in this but the other acclimatisation societies, indebted for our and their acclimatisation societies. The report, which was read by Mr. Secretary Ramsay, was then adopted for selection and consideration. There was £1172; and, in addition to the £2000 voted by Parliament for the maintenance of the Society, £1000 had been paid, leaving the current year's income £2500 for building and fences, and £500 from special votes passed in previous years for particular purposes. Of these amounts £1000 only remained available. The report further stated that measures were in progress for the introduction of the Angola hare, quail, pheasants, and various kinds of birds from England; deer, Cashmere goats, and black partridges from India; and other valuable animals from the Cape of Good Hope.—For all which money had been remitted. After the reading of the report, Professor M'Coy delivered a most learned and able dissertation, and his paper will be a valuable application to this colony.

A few days since Kendalls arrived here from India, bringing with him a rare and valuable collection of birds and animals. Amongst them are two orangoutangs.

The news that another All-England Eleven cricketers are about to pay us a visit is received with great satisfaction by the colonists. Whenever they do come they may calculate upon receiving a welcome as enthusiastic as that with which the former visitors were received. Mr. Charles Dickens will also visit this year in Sydney.

The town is upside and the drams in the old country will be pleased to hear that we have the opera here to a perfection that would do no disgrace to London or Paris. Mr. Howitt has brought over with him a troupe of the first discriminating audience. "The Huguenots," Meyerbeer's masterpiece, has been produced, and performed in a manner that would lead strangers to suppose that a liberally-conducted opera company will meet in Melbourne with a brilliant reception and success. Mr. Charles Packer is the lessee of the attracting crowded houses at the Haymarket, where he has appeared as Ephraim Smooth, Jacob Earwig, for the first time, as Macbeth.

Letters have been received from Mr. Howitt announcing the probability of his arriving in Melbourne about the middle of next month with the remains of Burke and Wills. Arrangements are being made for a public funeral, which is expected to be a very grand affair. The monument to the memory of the deceased heroes—for which £4000 has been voted by Parliament—is to be erected in the reserve surrounding the Parliament houses.

A service of plate has been presented to Mr. Landsborough by his friends and admirers in Melbourne. His Excellency the Governor made the presentation, in the Exhibition-building, in the presence of a numerous and brilliant audience. Similar honour has been conferred upon Mr. M'Kinlay, in South Australia, where, a few days ago, the Governor presented him with £1000, voted by the Legislature.

Trade is in a healthy condition. Large quantities of wool are daily arriving from the interior for shipment to this port, and prices are realised at high rates. There was a "run" of short duration on the Colonial Bank a few days ago.

There was a keen contest for the office of mayor of the city this year, as it is expected that the attainment of his majesty by the Prince of Wales will result in knighthood to the occupant. Mr. Colon, M.L.A., of the firm of Fraser and Colon, was the successful candidate. Mr. Colon belongs to the Jewish persuasion.

There was a destructive fire at Sandridge a few days ago, by which property worth £4,000 was consumed. Less than half of it was insured. Much of the property belonged to industrious working men who lived in their own houses. Some of them have lost everything they were worth. There is consequently a good deal of distress resulting from the fire.

The following are the names of the North Sea fleet:—Melbourne and Sydney, was completely wrecked on the 6th inst. She struck upon a rock, and went down in a few minutes afterwards. There were a number of passengers on board of whom had a narrow escape with their lives. The crew and passengers lost everything they had with them, and were taken off by the ship Ann Mary. Cargo valued at £9,000, neither the steamer nor cargo being insured. This is the second steamer that has been lost since the company took to the route.

A collision took place on the Williamstown Railway yesterday, which fortunately did not result in fatal consequences, although many of the passengers were much shaken.

The continued dry weather is causing much anxiety throughout Queensland, and rain hasn't been known to fall since. The cotton crop in the latter colony is looking well. Four shiploads of immigrants arrived in Brisbane in the course of four days, and there was no necessary intervention to be had for employment of labour, however, for all, and for as many more as like to come.

The last mail from Sydney is to the 26th inst., and there is a greater disposition than ever on the part of the natives to bring their differences with the British authorities to an amicable settlement.

OPENING OF THE FRENCH CHAMBERS, SPEECH OF THE EMPEROR.

THE Session of the Senate and Legislative Body was opened on the 12th inst. by the Emperor, who delivered the following Speech :—

Gentlemen Senators and Gentlemen Deputies,—

I have convoked you to open the Session earlier than usual. To anticipate the term of its Session fixed by the Constitution would have been in my eyes an act of ingratitude to the country. Chamber and I distrusted the necessities. The time no longer exists when it was considered necessary to seize the opportunity of a happy moment to obtain the fulfilment of the reasonable wishes of electors. To-day every one may perceive that there is no longer in the masses the dictatorship (meilleure) of a single man. The country wishes to be governed by the smallest breath which appears to agitate the political atmosphere.

Since we last met, Europe, which for a long time has seemed to cast a glance on what we have accomplished during the past five years, for it is only by contrasting a present with a past duration that we can appreciate the progress—Europe which has received the direction of affairs.

People attribute to me projects of conquest, of sovereign arrest and mysterious motives of combination, and yet my policy has been simple—to increase the prosperity of France and not to diminish that of neighbouring countries, and without weakening, the power placed in my hands abroad ; to favour, according to the interests of each, the development of the principles of order and of liberty towards a better future ; to develop our commercial relations with the countries which have understood the community of interests ; and to see if we cannot disappear from the papers of diplomacy the old questions in dispute, in order to set aside all pretexts for complications. I am ready, to-day, to receive with the reparation of every insult to our flag, of every injury inflicted upon our countrymen, and to which the Government, by its representations, would not have been permitted to apply these principles :—

In the East the Treaty of Paris and the Danubian provinces to form only one and the same people could not find an insensible, and our concurrence has contributed to constitute them. Moreover, we have supported with our arms and with the complaints of Servia and of Montenegro, and of the Syrian Christians, a patient negotiation which, without wounding the rights of the Sultan, secures the independence of Italy without making any compromise with the revolutionary ; without ceasing to be the chief of the good understanding with our adversaries for a single day ; and without abandoning the Holy Father, who overcomes and our past engagements oblige us to sustain.

We have endeavoured in the cases of simple wishes which might have arisen with Spain, whether from the non-demarcation of the frontiers, or from the ancient habit of the Court of Madrid to address itself to us in all its embarrassments, to the Despot Valley. Treaties of commerce have been, or are on the eve of being, concluded with Belgium, Switzerland, Turin, and with the Zollverein. Finally, expeditions to China, Cochin-China, and Mexico prove that there are no causes to detain us from giving to the world the spectacle of our power unimpeded. Such events could not have occurred without bringing about considerable expenses. The estimates which will be laid before you, however, has been aggravated by two provisions ; the carriers which separated us from the country, and the necessity of not leaving the army in the state of inactivity in the far East ; and, better still than conquest, we have acquired cities to the world by the opening of ports to the commerce of all nations of Governments.

During the years which have just elapsed it has been given to me to meet with the majority of the reigning Sovereigns, and from those interviews have sprung memorable results for the security and the good order of Europe. Thanks to peace cannot be disturbed by the events which have just taken place in Greece.

This rapid exposition of the past will enable you to form a judgment of, and notwithstanding the pressure of contrary events and of opposing opinions, I will not change it. Whatever I have always done in my conscience is the line of conduct.

In all which concerns more especially the internal situation I have desired, on the one hand, to efface by a complete amnesty, so far as in me lay, the memory of civil dissensions, and on the other to restore to the national sentiment of the great bodies of the State, I have called upon you to take a part more direct in the affairs of the country. The Senatus-consultum has accomplished all the guarantees which the liberty of discussion could demand. I have maintained the right of the Chambers to interpellation, and I have called upon Legislati to contract the expenditure in a more absolute manner, and to give more of stability to the budget. The Council of State has been reformed in order to relieve the finances, the army and navy have been reduced to peace proportions, and I have been able to reduce taxation, and by the successful conversion of the Rentes a large strike has been made towards the consolidation of the debt. The relations between the different Powers not having yet considered themselves able to join with me, I have been obliged to defer the reduction of the duties upon salt. Others submit to you for its object to stop the effusion of blood, and prevent the exhaustion of a country to the last of its resources by a prolonged struggle.

I will not enter with you into the detail of several administrative reforms—such as the institution of the Court of Accounts, the law upon the press, the establishment of institutions favourable to the poorer classes, the great public works, the encouragement given to agriculture, and the acts by which the existence of the prosperity of our colonies, despite the suppression of the colonial system, have been guaranteed. Your patriotism will know how to take care to gain more and more the affections of the Arab people, and to protect the rights of the Christian population, and the other administrative measures of each of these measures.

You are about to mark by useful labours the close of your period of service ; and, when you return into your departments do not leave it unknown that I am ready to receive the wishes and the complaints which any valuable objects, we owe this to the devoted co-operation of the great bodies of the State, and to the unanimous sympathy of the country, and that, nevertheless, much remains to do to perfect our institutions, to spread over them, and to consolidate them. I count upon you, Senators, Deputies, and fellow-citizens that I shall be always ready to accept what is for the interest of the Government, and to do what is for the welfare of the country. Whatever I have commenced, to avoid conflicts which only beget uneasiness, to strengthen the Constitution, and to found a liberal institution, and to rally around them who, like yourselves, accept without afterthought the actual regime, who wish for order and liberty, and who, without troubling themselves about the spirit of the epoch and by a real patriotism, enlighten in their independence the Government, and thus contribute to maintain and improve any party interest the stability of the State and the greatness of the country.

A new journal has been started in Copenhagen, having the peculiar feature of an English summary and an English leading article. The journal itself is daily, but the English columns will only make their appearance once a week.

From official returns it appears that there are published in Spain 1,000 periodicals, of which 1 is published in Andorra, 1 in Ceuta, 2 in Navarre, 13 Italian, 16 Hungarian, 3 Roumain, 2 Greek, 1 Slovack, and 3 Hebrew. Of these 1,000, Madrid has 200.

An extensive series of experiments is about to be made in France with the type-telegraph invented by M. Bonelli, by which five hundred dispatches of twenty-five words each can be printed within an hour. Should the experiments prove satisfactory it is intended to introduce this telegraph on the principal railway lines in France.

Mr. Price, the contractor to whose execution the works on the South-Eastern of Portugal Railway have been intrusted, has just returned from Lisbon, and reports that he will be prepared to open sixty miles of that railway in the month of June next, and the remaining twenty miles very shortly afterwards. It appears that the works have been executed in a very superior manner, and give great satisfaction to the Portuguese Government. One of the engines, the Don Luis, built by Beare, Peacock, and Co., of Manchester, intended for this line, gained the medal at the late Exhibition.

The Gazette of the 13th instant published a long list of promotions in the Indian army.

Captain Adrian Dalton, C.B., has been appointed Captain of Greenwich Hospital, in the place of Captain Willis, deceased.

Rear-Admiral Digby Marsh died at Cambridge last week, at the age of sixty-two.

Sixteen vessels have been paid off during the last quarter, and seventeen more are under orders to return home. To supply their places that seven ships have been commissioned.

A veteran, Donald Gordon, has died in Newcastle at the age of ninety-two. He was a sergeant-major in the Inniskillen Dragoons, the Regiment of Foot in fourteen battles, in Egypt, the Peninsula, and New Orleans.

Her Majesty has ordered that, from and after the 16th of December, 1862, it shall be lawful for all military officers in her Majesty's service to enter into the military service of the Emperor of China, or to accept any commission.

Earl Grey, Under-Secretary of State for War, made an official visit of inspection of the new barracks at Cashmin on the 12th inst. The noble Earl afterwards went over the Royal Army Clothing Factory at Pimlico.

A general order from the Horse Guards, promulgated at Aldershot parade, directs that the cavalry shall in future be armed with lances are to be invariably worn under the chin, both by officers and men, on all occasions.

The Paris papers announce the death of Dr. Gunning, an old Anglo-Parisian physician, who was Deputy-Inspector-General of Hospitals at Calais, which post he held during the Peninsular War. He was a friend of Lord Fitzroy Somerset, afterwards Lord Raglan. He went to Paris with the soldier's army, and there he resided from that time. He expired on Friday last, from an attack of bronchitis, at the ripe age of ninety.

"It has been decided for the future," says a new memorandum, issued from the Horse Guards, "that in future the half-yearly competitive examinations for admission to the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, to the object for which they are established, namely, that the successful candidates will be regarded as qualified for commissions in the Line on account of the examination which they have undergone, and without undergoing examination to the Royal Military Academy. The same rule will also apply to the competitive examinations for admission to the Military College, Sandhurst."

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

On the 14th inst. the distribution of prizes to the successful competitors in the 36th Middlesex took place at the Drill-hall, Cowley, Uxbridge, in the presence of a large audience. Major M'Murdo, C.B. The hall was completely filled by the volunteers and their friends.

A match was fired on the 14th inst., between the second (Inland Revenue) company Civil Service and the second company of the Artist Corps, at Wimbledon. Ten men were selected from each of the companies. The Artists won by 26 points.

On the 7th inst. the contest for three silver cups, given by the Marquis of Donegall, for the three first prizes in the Private Chatsock ; the second prize was won by Private Bell ; and the third prize by Ensign Ibbs.

The 38th Middlesex (Artists' Corps) held their fourth half-yearly supper on the 8th inst.

The battalion match, between twenty members of the West Middlesex and twenty of the St. George's, took place on the 12th inst. at the target of the Queen's Westminster Rifle Volunteers, kindly lent by the West Middlesex. Private Smith, of that corps, having made the highest score, received a tankard.

The presentation of prizes to the 2nd Leicester, or Belvoir Castle Company, took place on the 8th inst. at Belvoir Castle. Afterwards a handsome entertainment was given by Lord Robert Manners, to which all the Manners presided.

The annual meeting of the 9th Kent (Chatham) Volunteer Rifle Corps was held on the 8th inst. at the head-quarters of the company. A silver inkstand, subscribed for by the officers and members of the corps, was presented to Captain Cole, on his retirement from the command of the company.

The 1st Cambridgeshire Corps had a competition last week for a challenge cup. Ensign J. Fuller, Private Hitsman, and Private A. Smith, 1st, were the successful competitors in the gravel victorious.

The 19th North York Volunteers held a rifle contest on the 8th inst. The match between the married and single volunteers was the chief attraction. The terminated in favour of the latter. Lieutenant Hall's prize was won by Ensign Fowle; who, however, gave way to the second shot, Private Hollins. The second prize was subsequently divided by Colour-Sergeant Holt, Sergeant Oliver, and Corporal May, who did not shoot off.

The Alabama had played a bold trick. On the 7th of December she intercepted the New York and Aspinwall steamer Ariel, off the east end of Cuba, and took from her 9000 dols. The Ariel was then allowed to proceed on her course for 178,000 dollars in specie, which she had received at Aspinwall for the Southern Confederacy. The result of this proceeding was that on the return voyage the Ariel did not touch at Cuba from Aspinwall, but the Federal Government had sent a war-steamer to fetch it. The West Indian mail brings us further intelligence of the Alabama. She captured the ship Tonawanda and captured an American barque, laden with provisions, and after having taken out the crew, and put on board a prize crew, she allowed the barque to go free to the vessel. He had also seized a Federal schooner, but as her cargo was the property of British subjects he released her. He promised to give the captain signing a bond to pay a certain sum of money to the Confederate Government in case of the loss of the vessel.

THE CAREER OF THE ALABAMA.—(To the Editor.)—Will you grant me space to correct a few of the numerous errors in Mr. Underhill's communication to the Statesman referring to the Confederate cruiser Alabama, a copy of which has been forwarded to me from Cadiz ? 1. She was set built under contract with a Mr. Bulloch. 2. Her engines are by Penn, of London, Day, Summers, and Birkenhead. 3. She was, after having Birkenhead, steam directly to the island in the Atlantic, 4., but proceed direct to and ships in Madeira Bay on the coast of Wales, taking in there a portion of her crew, boulet stores, &c. 4. Her destination was not "Turkey," wherever that may be, but Teneriffe, one of the Azores. 5. She was then commanded by a Captain Bullock. The gentleman who took charge of her from this time she left the docks till she was delivered into the hands of Captain Semmes of the Confederate navy, was Captain M. J. Butcher, R.N.R. 6. The Alabama and an English papers to prove her ownership in fact, she carried no papers whatever. 7. She was no visited daily by large parties of the inhabitants of "Tarisea," or Teneriffe. Obviously on the 22nd of January A.D., Until Jan. 12, 1863.

GREAT FIRE AT PLYMOUTH.

On the morning of the 6th inst. a fire broke out in an isolated block of buildings at Plymouth, consisting of an hotel, assembly-rooms, and a theatre. The site occupies more than an acre, and the buildings were erected by the Corporation at a cost of £50,000.

During the performance of the Christmas Pantomime on the night of the 6th inst. at the theatre, at which there was a crowded audience, there was a strong smell of fire, and some uneasiness was in consequence displayed; but confidence was restored after a strict examination of every part of the building and a declaration that the supposed smell of burning timber arose from a piece of burning wood from a fire in one of the apartments of the building. The performances were brought to a close, and the audience left in as merry a mood as could be wished. After the house was clear, on a suspicion that a smell of fire still existed, the manager, Mr. Newcombe, his son, and others again went over every part of the premises, and the house was left under the assurance that all was right. Not long afterwards, however, the alarm was given of the outbreak, which showed itself by the smoke making its way into the apartments of the Royal Hotel, adjoining the theatre. The police and the agents of the fire-offices having engines soon received intelligence of the occurrence, while signal-guns from the citadel and the guard-ship in Hamoaze aroused the military and naval authorities. The fire-engines immediately attended, but the fire-plugs could not be got any way for want of the keys, and the military, though turned out, were kept at "stand at ease" till an official request was made for their attendance. At last a detachment of Royal Marines, under the command of Colonel Clavell, arrived with the barrack fire-engine, followed by a detachment of the 73rd with an engine from the citadel, under the command of Major Wood. The 32nd Light Infantry also sent a detachment, accompanied by Major Clapcott. A large party of the Royal Artillery and Engineers, were also present, as was also Brigade Major Keith. The naval brigade was accompanied by Captain Vessey, of her Majesty's ship Royal Adelaide. The Mayor, superintendents, and a strong body of police early on the spot. The other engines in attendance were the West of England (which arrived first), the County Fire, and the South Devon Railway—making about seven in all.

The fire meanwhile had raged furiously, threatening the hotel, the inmates of which were aroused and escaped. A little before one o'clock flames had spread to the ballroom, and in a short time the whole of this splendid room was doomed. At a quarter past one the roof of the beautiful portico fell in with a tremendous crash, and a dense volley of smoke and sparks shot up from the lurid mass. From that time huge rafters all aglow kept falling. In a short time the card-room and the assembly-room of the hotel were destroyed, and, with a rising wind, the whole building seemed doomed. But by three o'clock the firemen had got the mastery, and by about ten o'clock in the morning the fire was completely subdued.

THE THEATRE AND ROYAL HOTEL AT PLYMOUTH, SHORTLY AFTER THE LATE FIRE.

This alarming fire was attended with comparatively little damage. On an inspection of the premises the body of the theatre was found to be but little damaged by fire, the loss being confined to the vestibule, staircases, refreshment and property rooms. Between the theatre and the Royal Hotel were the assembly-rooms. Of these, the building which immediately adjoins the theatre, and contained the staircase leading to the ballroom, a handsome billiard-room on the ground floor, with a large cardroom over, and ample cellars beneath, nothing remains but the bare walls, the fire having raged here with the greatest violence. From this building the hotel is separated by another large building, containing on the ground floor the tearoom, and on the first floor the ballroom, with wine and spirit cellars on the basement. Here the fire caught the roof, about a third of which is destroyed, carrying with it also in its fall destruction to about a third of the ceiling and of the flooring of the ballroom. The remaining portions of those rooms are almost intact. To the east of this building is the Royal Hotel, the business rooms of which the fire did not reach. Some of the upper bedrooms suffered, however, in the exertions made to extinguish the adjoining fire. This fire, therefore, although it has occasioned great inconvenience to the lessees of the hotel and theatre, has in neither instance peremptorily suspended business for any length of time. The hotel business continues without interruption, and the theatre will be reopened within a very short period—if, indeed, it be not already open.

GREAT FIRE AT LOUTH, LINCOLNSHIRE.

ONE of the most calamitous fires ever known in Louth took place on the 3rd inst. About one o'clock in the morning flames burst forth from the second-story windows of Messrs. Sutton and Oldroyd, drapers, so fiercely that before engines could be got to the spot the whole of the upper part of these extensive premises were crackling in the flames. The inmates, twenty in number, who fortunately slept at the back of the premises, were roused only just in time to save their lives. About two o'clock the whole of Messrs. Sutton and Oldroyd's shop and back buildings were a mass of flames; and Mr. Coleridge's on one side, and Mr. Preston's and Mr. Haxey's on the other, were on fire. The shops opposite were charred, and it seemed that they must ignite, and probably would have done so had not the engines played upon them until the worst of the fire was over. It was soon found that the three fire-engines of the town were powerless to stay the fire; and, as the whole of Mercer-row, the principal business street in the town, was in danger, engines were telegraphed for from Grimsby, Alford, and Boston. The engine and the brigade from the latter town, a distance of thirty-four miles, arrived in less than one hour from the dispatch of the telegram, and rendered essential service in arresting the progress of the flames. The supply of water in the immediate neighbourhood was soon exhausted. Engines were then employed to pump the water from St. Helen's Springs—a distance of about two hundred yards—an engine being placed at about every fifty yards to pump the water on to the scene of action. At seven o'clock the massive front walls fell inwards burying the whole of an extensive stock of drapers' goods, valued at about £10,000. The fall of the walls so far smothered the flames as to make the danger to the adjoining buildings very small. The engines continued to throw water on the mass of ruins until Sunday morning. All the sufferers are insured, though not to the extent of their losses. The whole of the damage done amounts to about £14,000. The cause of the fire was a beam in a flue igniting. The sketch from which our Engraving is taken was made by Mr. T. W. Wallis, of Louth, on the morning of the 5th inst.

NEW IMPERIAL CHINESE SQUADRON.

OUR Engraving represents some of the vessels of war fitting out in this country for the Chinese Government, under the immediate superintendence of Captain Sherard Osborne, C.B., a distinguished officer of our naval service, and a gentleman of large experience in affairs relating to the country for which they are intended. They are mostly selected from that class of vessels belonging to this Government known as despatch gun-boats, and are commissioned by commanders of our own Navy, and each carry about four guns of heavy calibre. They will number about ten vessels in all, and will shortly leave this country for their destination.

resounded with thanksgivings of a still higher kind, and we should have rendered grateful homage to Providence for having strengthened a kindred nation to wipe away a stain upon humanity.

Even as it is, and in spite of the fact that for all practical purposes the proclamation is a sham, the words cannot be read without emotion. The President decrees freedom to the slaves in ten States. But the more we should have rejoiced had the measure been one of peaceful civilisation the more bitter is the feeling that the document was prompted only for the embarrassment of an enemy, and that it will be in most instances a brutum fulmen, while perhaps in others it may bring on melancholy results. It is not the Government of America that issues this proclamation, but the chief of certain States that are seeking empire over others. The document is no noble State paper, the crowning of a deliberate and generous policy, but an experiment designed to help on a disastrous and unjustifiable war. It is simply an attempt to explode a mine under the feet of those upon whom cannon have thundered in vain. The President of the North, if he believes that his proclamation will take effect, is in the position of a soldier who employs some new and barbarous method of extermination at his antagonists. Could the notification really effect what some of the Abolitionists profess to desire, the savages who poison wells, the miscreants who leave poisoned stores behind them, are humane and civilised enemies in comparison to those who sign and publish this document. But we will not believe that the Abolitionist doctrine is that of Mr. Lincoln, who has always been accounted a kindly, if coarse and shortsighted, man. He does not think that his notice that the slaves are free will set four millions of revengeful Africans firing, plundering, and slaying; but he probably does hope that he will embarrass the Confederate General; and, moreover, he has obeyed the dictates of the powerful faction that has hitherto made him its tool, to the eternal detriment of the once mighty Republic which he was elected to govern.

Yet it is impossible not to feel a great and a new anxiety while we await information as to the results of this step. The President vows to his friends and supporters that on the 1st, and did not issue the proclamation until the second of the month. That the Confederates knew that it had been finally resolved upon may be assumed as certain, and it is equally so that they will have taken the most determined means to meet it. Indeed, the counter-proclamation of Jefferson Davis, though couched in angry and mainly directed against a man who had been recalled before the Southern document was issued, is intended as a repressive agency. Mr. Lincoln tells the slave that he is free, and that he will be supported in what he is curiously called his country; Mr. Davis tells him that if he is taken across the dividing line whose limits he never shall be liable to suffer death, and that he himself shall be handed over to the tender mercies of the State to which he belongs; and the slave knows what that means, and would, if captured, gladly compound for the more merciful doom decreed to his white officer. All this is very terrible, and even if we can see a fearful revenge thus menaced shall be taken, America will be glad hereafter to tear from her history the pages in which such documents are preserved—to destroy such evidences that the boasted advance of education and civilisation had done so little for her nations that they had recourse in war time to means of indiscriminate massacre. But we should not that the President of the Southern States has done more than issue this proclamation. He has caused it to be understood wherever there is a negro who can carry arms. The Lincoln proclamation will have been kept out of the Slave States as much as possible, but Mr. Davis will not keep out any such precaution. He knows that the Abolitionists are active and skilful, that they have a complex "underground" agency in the South, and that they will use every effort to make the negroes aware of the Washington manifesto. It will be impossible to prevent its coming to the knowledge of thousands of slaves. But we mistake the stern character of the Confederate authorities if they have not made preparations for dealing in the most terrible manner with the first Africans who may take advantage of Mr. Lincoln's verbal enfranchisement of the race. The Abolitionist may have cause to shudder at the example that will be made of those whom they have incited into an attempt to defy soldiers flushed with four great victories over the North.

But, on consideration, we are inclined to retain our conviction—which is, in all probability, Mr. Lincoln's (we hope so)—that if the slaves have to be moved by documents they would not have been moved much sooner. They showed no signs of insurrection, so far as we know, when their masters were weak; they now know that their masters are strong and victorious, and it is improbable that the black man's inclination to rise will be stirred by the news of a victory which has been received

FINE ARTS.

EXHIBITION FOR THE RELIEF OF LANCASHIRE DISTRESS.—A second exhibition has been opened this week for the relief of the poor unemployed operatives in the North. The excellent exhibition at the German Gallery, New Bond-street, of works given by a large number of our best water-colour painters, has already been noticed in these columns. The second exhibition, which is larger, and contained in two rooms of the Society of British Artists' apartments, in Suffolk-street, is a miscellaneous collection of works of art, the free contributions of professional artists and also amateurs, some of whom are perfectly qualified to claim, if they would, professional recognition. It is astonishing how many persons are distinguished in some other way, or well known in the fashionable circles of London society, have come forward, in the simple guise of modest amateurs, to contribute to this exhibition. The result is altogether one of the most varied, charming, and agreeable little public shows we have seen.

No one certainly will be offended if we give the pas in this notice to works which have been contributed by artists of assured reputation. Royal Academicians and others, because such gifts have not a marketable value, and their presentation is especially honourable, since it amounts to depositing so much value in the hands of the secretary. First, then, we will enumerate a pen-sketch and a finished water-colour drawing by Mr. Millais, R.A., by a picture of "The Disobedient Prophet" slain by the lion, in which the dead body is admirably foreshortened, and the colouring varied and effective; next, several admirable studies contributed by Mr. Cope; then Venetian and other sketches by Mr. Cooke; spirited sketches of a costermonger, a sandboy, and Swiss, Welsh, and Highland peasants, by Mr. Stanfield; an exquisite vignette illustration to "The Grave," by Montgomery, and other finished studies by Mr. Creswick; Rhenish and French studies by Mr. D. Roberts, R.A.; Mr. Maclise's gift for his illustration of Tennyson's "Dora;" a finished oil study by Mr. Calcott, in one of the nooks of honour, in the vicinity of "Queen Catherine;" an impressionist picture, by Mr. Desanges, of "Christ Raising the Son of the Widow of Nain;" a deep-toned bust of a Roman soldier, by Mr. Weigall; and a richly-painted study of a Cadi-Ruler by Mr. Buckner; a head by Mr. Leighton; a study for a picture of Mr. Samuel Solomon, R.A.; Mr. Smith's drawing of a girl at a cottage-window watering a pot of flowers by Mr. Boughton, a still nearer approach to the peculiar merits of Edouard Frere than two small works which Mr. Boughton has previously made his debut (as far as we remember) at the British Institution last year; a drawing of a cow-boy, by Mr. Oakley, R.A.; a study by Mr. Phillip; Mr. Boyce, both remarkable for detail truth and finish; a drawing by Mr. Nesbit; a picture of a fairyland by Mr. H. Moore; a drawing of a wood-nymph, by Mr. Redgrave, R.A.; Mr. Frith's drawing of a lovely fruit and flower subjects by Mr. and Miss Lance and the Misses Mutrie.

The works of generally less-known contributors (for the most part amateurs) are, in many instances, specimens of considerable merit. Many are technically imperfect, many are exaggerated; but all the amateur performances are entitled to respect for the proofs they afford of the love of Art, and even the exaggerations are generally evidence of a sympathetic admiration for the intense artistic perceptions of which they evince more or less.

Among the most interesting contributions to this collection are some small water-colour drawings of still-life and etchings, after Turner, by Mr Ruskin. They are chiefly colour—but a study of "Fish" affords the dictum that "there should be no touch without white"—on blue paper; the latter is a species of tinted paper which Mr. Ruskin uses and sets ample. They have the most minute delicacy and variety of form and hue, and consistently illustrate the leading principle of "Modern Painters," that the only way to arrive at the highest truth is accurate objective imitation. Such effortlessly minute and painfully subtle work as this is, however, only a part of the machinery of art, and represents a very small space in its infinite range. One of Mrs. Newton's copies after the old masters, a large and very careful copy, after the Rev. Boogeycot, of the Marriage of St. Catherine, in the National Gallery, is deservedly placed in a conspicuous position. This lady (the wife of the painter) has buried ruins at Hulcaster, which contributes a chalk portrait of Princess Alice of Hesse, for which her Royal Highness not only sat expressly, but graciously added the autograph. The slightly-pensive sweetness of the Princess has been perfectly caught. There is also a number of water-colour copies after Rembrandt, Vandyke, &c., by a Monsieur Borz, some of which are remarkable for force of colour. The catalogue informs us that "by the kindness of Lady Eastlake the artist has sent from Rome that a proportion of the proceeds of their sale will be devoted to the purposes of the exhibition." Mr. Ian Robertson has a clever, bold, free, and meritorious oil landscape—a view of "Clapton in the Vale of Portington."

Among works not yet noticed the landscapes in water-colours preponderate in number and merit. In this class are several noteworthy drawings by Mr. Walker and Andrew Scrase, pictures by Mr. Newton, and some of the artist-fi.nd who nursed poor Keats, the poet, on patches in the last illness of that poet, and who is now living in the city. A view by Mr. Arthur Severn of "St. Paul's, from the Thames at Westminster," under an effect of silver morning light, is striking by boldness, and an elaborate observation of atmosphere. But the works in this class deserving attention for merit or interest of some kind are so numerous that our limited space compels us to mere enumeration. We must be content, then, with enlisting the visitor to examine the drawings of Mrs. Russell Gurney's "View from the Chalet of Vilard, above the Rhone Valley"—which is a fine and delicately finished in execution; Miss M. Gastineau's mellowtoned view of "Windermere;" several admirable drawings by Mr. Bodichon, particularly a view of "Algiers," and another of "Kildare Castle and Cathedral;" Mr. Boddington's "Gulf of Spezia," with a pearly morning effect; another striking effect of "Sunset at Athens, with local mist, by Miss Catherine North; two Italian scenes, pure in tone, and well composed, by Miss Mutrie; Mr. Lee Wyndham's drawing of Kicklorn by Mrs. Lowes, reminding us of G. Fripp; a view, by Miss Jackson, of the Bridge of Sweethearts at Nuremberg, with the enowy peak catching the first pink ray of sunrise; a fine study of a stormy shore by Mr. J. L. Hall; a sketch in the trenches of Sebastopol, by Viscount Duncannon; Mr. Wyke Bayliss's "A Street in Tanglers," by Mr. Brabazon, evincing true though unfinished effect; Mr. Ray of Ely; Mr. Jay's "Bay of Naples;" Mr. Twopeny; a clever sketch for a picture by Mr. Pilleau; a moonlight view of Llanberis by Mr. J. A. Bostock; Welsh and Swiss scenes by Miss Blake; Miss Sabine's "Highland Burn;" Mr. Fripp's works of Lady Belcher, Mesdames Edward Romilly, Ludlow, Sturch, Hutton, Pinhorn, and Miss Sharpe; Mr. Hine's "Bay of Naples;" the drawings of the Hon. E. Scott, Mr. Collier, G.C. and M.P.; and Messrs. Aylmer, Kempe, C. Gordon, Parry, Nottingham, Pocock, Cheney, Harper, and Jenyns. There are scenes of every kind of beauty in this collection, especially of the magnolia in blossom, which are extremely captivating by their richness and delicacy of handling and power of colour.

Among figure-pictures still claiming attention is a rustic fireside in oil, by Mr. Hardy, certain qualities of effect and the evident painstaking in which are very commendable. Mr. Boddington's "Flight into Egypt" seems to deserve a better place. As nearly as we could judge, it is conceived and executed in the true spirit of early Italian art. Its appropriate imitation fifteenth-century-shaped frame was alone a great novelty. Miss Boddington also sends drawings reminiscent of Venetian colour. Mr. Dicey's manly water-colour study of a Roman boy and girl should not be overlooked. Mr. Fallourd has also played student and painter subjects. A pretty female head by Lady Harry Vane; a subject by Miss Gillies; a sketch of an old man reading, by Lady Belcher; and the works of Mr. Fripp, Miss Benham Carter, and Miss Lucette Barker likewise agreeably diversify the department.

The Rev. R. St. John Tyrwhitt contributes two proofs of etchings entitled "Where Shadows Coom," and "The Rose of Dawn," which are almost as indescribably strange and widely imaginative as anything left by poor Blake. Nonsuch, of steam-hammer renown, sends proofs of his well-known etchings "Everybody for Himself" and "The Fairies," which are as elaborately and exuberantly fanciful as anything by George Cruikshank. Dr. Hadon's etchings have a very degree of technical excellence. Mr. H. J. Lucas's pen-and-ink studies are also extremely elegant. But, perhaps, the most purely beautiful and imaginative pen-drawings are two by the Hon. Mrs. Boyle of "The Nativity," in which the angelic visitors are introduced with the graceful and pious fancy of early Italian art; and the other of a dead infant in its coffin laid out on the margin of a rain sea, over which, towards the setting sun, glides the mediæval "ship of souls." In addition to these framed works portfolios full of drawings have been contributed to this exhibition, besides drawings by old masters, photographs, china, &c. We are glad to learn that a very large proportion of works have already been sold—a result which the moderate prices, very judiciously asked, in almost every instance.

THE EXHIBITION OF THE PHOTOGRAPHIC SOCIETY.

The ninth annual exhibition of the Photographic Society was this week opened to the public. It occupies the same rooms in the Society of British Artists, Suffolk-street; the remaining two apartments being occupied by the Exhibition for the Relief of Lancashire Distress, noticed elsewhere. The first year's exhibition of this Society was variously illustrative of the art, and especially of its many new applications, which are becoming collectively very large, however that unforeseen demands on our space oblige us to defer till next week a detailed notice of the many interesting and valuable features of this display. In the mean time we may point out that the system of "enlarging" photographs, in which the future of some branches of photography is doubtless situated, has received increased attention; that the very valuable processes for transferring the photographic images to stone, wood, &c., already employed in the Ordnance Survey, are receiving development; that the difficulties attending the production of pure carbon prints are being surmounted; and photographic portraiture is becoming every day more perfect. Groups of objects as represented to the perception by our binocular vision: The photographic art is becoming more educated in the principles of art as well as science. Admirable photographs of our Architectural Exhibition, Loan and National Collections, are exhibited by the London Stereoscopic Company, in Regent-street. Among the noteworthy also are the Eastern and other subjects by Mr. Bedford; the lake and river pictures by Mr. Vaughan; the Egyptian studies by the figure-studies by Viscountess Hawarden; the large and fine foreign contributions in the south-west room, and the works of Messrs. Mudd, Heath Wilson, Wilson Laws, H. P. Robinson, Mr. Rejlander, and Vernon Heath. There are no portraits for purity and beauty of outline like vignettes of this kind, and Mr. Heath's are in many striking likenesses by Claudet. Among the coloured photographs the miniatures of Messrs. Lock and Whitfield decidedly bear the bell, not only for artistic excellence but also for the respect paid to the likeness.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.

THE weekly evening meetings of the Society of Arts were resumed on the 14th inst., when a very interesting communication was read by Mr. Solomon Cutler, of the Photographic Institution, Educationally considered," was read by Mr. Samuel Highley, F.C.S., and by Mr. Solomon Cutler, on the practical application of the photographic art are well known. The lecturer gave a brief description of the various processes employed in taking the portraits of models being exhibited on the table; and several very ingenious and portable modifications of the camera, adapted for taking portraits under circumstances of considerable attention; as also a new description of artificial light, introduced by Mr. Highley for photographic purposes. It gives a blue light of pure color, the light from which, though faint, is exceedingly rich in actinic and chemical power. The lecturer was followed by a short but very animated discussion which, when brought near the flame, glowed as if incandescent.

Mr. Highley subsequently exhibited to the Photographic Society of London, a standard size, which he fixes at 34in. square, should be adopted for three purposes—viz., for exhibition, for the Royal Academy, and for reproductions will require to be magnified to this extent before the photograph is taken, and the negative will, therefore, be of the size of a large octavo schromatic microscope, was fully explained. For slides of natural scenery, figures of various kinds, &c., the lecturer recommended a semi-transparency, of 3-4 in. diameter. At the conclusion of the lecture a very interesting collection of slides was exhibited, illustrative of the use of hydrogen light, and afforded ample proof of the value of this means of illustration. Mr. Highley has, for many years, been engaged in the production of slides for the purposes of the microscope, and has, we believe, produced more slides than any other person in England. The exhibition of the common flea, magnified to a size to be seen by an audience of several hundreds, and of the Acarus Scabiei (Itch of Goethe's "Reynard the Fox," Schmorr's Bible pictures, and copies of some of the choicest productions of the Stereoscopic Company, as well as numerous by a series of views, the production of Mr. Jones, and copied from the celebrated collection of Mr. Ponsford, of Bath, illustrative of the geology of the cotton famine in the Lancashire districts which have appeared in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, and which, we understand, are to appear in the "Athenæum" which followed, Mr. Pocrall, the secretary of the London Stereoscopic Company, explained the mode in which the stereoscopic engravings so as to afford interesting scenes for the magic lantern at a small expense. He also explained the mode of manner in which these drawings bore the unexpectedly severe test of being magnified so as to fill a space of many square feet, and yet retaining their sharpness and delicacy more than life size. Another gentlemen present remarked upon the value of the stereoscopic process in the representation of machinery, instancing its enabling him to illustrate to his pupils the first steamers produced in the Thames from the model of Symington, which plied for a few months only, but he may so express it, the distinguishing characteristics of the various species of steamers. The lecturer, in reply to a question, stated that there was a strong conviction of the great value in an educational point of view of the glasses exhibited, which concluded by paying a high and well-merited compliment to Mr. Highley.

THE DISTRESS IN THE NORTH.

At the meeting of the Central Relief Committee, on the 12th inst., Mr. Farnall reported that the number of persons relieved in the week ending the 10th inst. was 439,000, and £36,667, including the £20,000 from the balance of the Indian Famine Fund. The total sum now in hand is £1,000,000. Mr. Bowser read a report on the clothing which were received at the Bridewell depôt during the week was 132 packing of the week ending the 10th inst. 1,000 packages were delivered to districts in 1620, of which 77 were dispatched last week.

Mr. Farnall, in the course of the discussion, read a number of flour and oatmeal to the Lancashire operatives, the gift of the inhabitants of Charlotte Town, Prince Edward Island.

In consequence of a suggestion emanating from Commodore Yelverton, C.B., the officers and men belonging to the Coastguard have come forward with a day's pay towards relieving the distress existing in the manufacturing districts. The sum already collected amounts to upwards of £1,000.

A county meeting in aid of the Lancashire distress was held at Worcester on the 16th inst., when Lord Lyttelton, who presided, read a letter from Sir J. E. Shuttleworth, who said there was reason to expect that "the mills in the principal towns would be at work in a month." The meeting passed a highly encomium on the liberality of England during this sad calamity.

The Right Hon. T. Milner Gibson, M.P., is expected to address his constituents at Ashton-under-Lyne, on the 21st inst.

An International Agricultural Exhibition is to be opened at Hamburg on the 14th of July next, for the space of one week. The countries are making exertions to induce all steam navigation and railroad companies to convey at reduced rates of freight live stock, machinery, agricultural implements, and produce that may be destined for the exhibition.

We read in the Daghladet:—"The States of Holstein have been convoked by a Royal patent, dated Dec. 23, according to which they will meet at Slyeben on Jan. 24. It is nearly two years since the last Session of the Holstein States, and, under the circumstances of the present time, the debates will be looked for with great interest."

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

A POWERFUL OXYDISING MIXTURE has been made known by a Dutch chemist, M. Bastger. It is formed by a mixture of three parts of oil of vitriol and two parts of permanganate of potash. Ether, alcohol, sulphur is crystized to sulphuric acid with a rending noise. If a small portion be placed in a flask the air in it is instantly combined.

COMPOSITION OF LUCIFER-MATCHES.—In the Repertoire de Chimie is a memoir by M. Winkelried, giving an account of a series of experiments on substances suitable to be employed in this important manufacture. He states that sesquisulphuret of antimony, nitrate of chlorate of potash and hyposulphite of lead give the best results; those which contain sugar, charcoal, ferrocyanide of potassium, and nitrate of lead take fire very readily also, but are hygroscopic, and are therefore inferior to the former. The matches prepared with hyposulphite of lead present the advantages of being devoid of phosphorus and of being very economically prepared.

AN ACCLIMATISATION OF AMERICAN PLANTS at the gardens of the Royal Horticultural Society at Chiswick seems very successful. Mr. Harvey and Caddy-y, of Knephill, the chief exhibitors, have informed the council that they have now in their stores of plants ready on sale at the Chiswick Gardens. They say, "In ordinary seasons we should be able to fill two or three cart loads, but this year our failure has been so. We never saw such an occurrence, nor does the oldest man in our nursery. Of course, reasoning only; but we have always found that the hotter the year the more we have made."

THE NERVOUS SYSTEM IN THE LOBSTER has been minutely considered by Dr. M. S. Clos'on, who has published an elaborate paper, with many engravings, in the Montpellier Medical Journal. He says, in conclusion, that a careful consideration of the minute structure of the nervous system of any animal, and especially of that of the lobster, shows us that histologically and physiologically the vertebrate and invertebrate animals are nearly allied. In every case all the ganglia and interganglionic cord of the lobster correspond to the spinal cord of the vertebrate, while the cephalic ganglion is analogous to the encephalon, and functions in the same manner. The single decay to segmentation seen in the lobster is the most advanced form of the nervous system in the invertebrate animals, and in this division the nervous system does not form the centre round which all the organs are grouped, as it does in the vertebrate animals, but is itself subordinate to the organs, as it has been lightly such generalisations as of these kinds. Such an examination makes us esteem the labours of Swammerdam and Milne-Edwards in the crustacea, as being only a prelude to a more natural and philosophical classification.

RESPIRATION DURING SLEEP.—In a paper on the quantity of air necessary for respiration, read before the Academy of Medicine, at Paris, M. Dalzevie, after referring to the habit of wild animals which retire for rest to dens and to the instinct which leads them to choose the most secure of such air, a practice imitated by man in the savage state, and by soldiers, who select sheltered situations when they bivouac, said that animals vitiate the air exhale by day the oxygen which they absorb during night. Should not ventilation by night as by day? Ventilation ought to inspire during sleep a little of the gas which they exhale when awake?

PHOTOGRAPHIC WATER PAPERS.—A process for their production has been patented by Mr. Thomas Sutton, of Maidstone. The papers are first borne in the laboratory furnace, and the ashes left without combustion for several hours at the same heat. They are then washed. They are then weighed, and ten parts of these cinders mixed with five parts of dried carbonate of soda. The mass is then fused from two to three hours at an elevated temperature, produces readily granules of silver; and the drop of silver which dissolves readily in nitric acid. Nitrate of silver is then dissolved in water, and the silver remains under the form of a black powder at the bottom of the vessel. It is then washed and dried carefully. In general, sates produced from the cuttings of proofs, from the débris of old films, &c., renders from three to four ounces of their weight in silver, and the drop of silver contains from one to two per cent of gold.

PURE PEPSINE.—Pepsine may be precipitated from its solutions by agitation with finely-divided phosphate of lime, or other animal charcoal. Dissolved in water containing phosphoric acid, it may be precipitated when the solution is saturated with salt. The pepsine may also be precipitate of phosphate of lime without always being found in a state of combination with it. In this case it is treated with water containing acidulated, when the pepsine is in a state of purity hitherto unknown, which has resulted him to ascertain its composition and properties. It is a white, pearly mass, of a faint odour, and a taste resembling that of the tincture. The details of his process for obtaining it from the mucous membrane of the stomach of the pig, will be found in the last number of the Journal de Pharmacie, where it is said that our notions respecting pepsine ought to be modified by the results of his analysis of it.

A NEW PHOTOMETER, invented by Professor H. Dove, is described in a paper which appears in the Philosophical Magazine, for December. The instrument consists of a tube, which is blackened internally, and which has a diaphragm at the source of light from the same, the increase of the acting surface of the same being facilitating it to measure the quantity of light. The instrument is the singular projection of that surface, in which case the cylindrical aperture can be made to correspond to the circumference of the inside, that only rays which pass through the diaphragm reach the eye. The rotation of an ocular prescribed by Professor Nicol after the manner of Wollaston, is introduced in the aperture of the objective tube. For details as to the mode of construction of the instrument and the manner of using it we refer to the paper itself, merely adding M. Dove's estimation of the advantages of his method over existing methods, which is to the effect that it is very delicate, is applied to objects of any size in the same manner, whether they are brightly or feebly luminous, and is free from the disadvantages of the interposition of opaque; that, moreover, it is fitted for determining the intensity of light of optical instruments, and that of several different methods of measurement which mutually control each other; and, lastly, that it is obtained by means of instruments which, for the most part, are found in almost every man of science.

THE AMERICAN FOSSIL ELEPHANT (Elephas Columbe of Dr. Falconer) forms the subject of a most elaborate article by Dr. Falconer in the new number of the Natural History Review. It is of great importance, its range of habitat, geological position, its range in time, its distinctive characters in relation to the mammoth and living Asiatic elephants, &c., and has thus contributed a copious monograph on a subject of the highest interest to naturalists. It appears that the remains of elephants of the molar teeth, from Georgia, Mexico, in America, and from Brazil, on Asiatics.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

PROFESSOR FRANKLAND commenced his Sixth and last lecture "On Water," at the Royal Institution, on Saturday last, by exhibiting a large mass of ice in crystals, lent to him by the Spanish Prince, the Conte de Montemon, who is accordingly deserving of acknowledgment. The lecturer then proceeded to the most interesting series of experiments, showing the properties of hydrogen—its extreme lightness in relation to atmospheric air, its solubility in atmospheric air; its feeble name made dazzlingly brilliant by the introduction of pieces of steel spring, lime, platinum, &c. Hydrogen was shown to be capable of forming as a strong glass vessel, by means of the electric spark, some drops of water were produced. The lecturer then proceeded to show how hydrogen combines with steam. This greatly expanded form of water is colourless and transparent, and much lighter than air. The lecturer showed that it could be condensed again, forming a vacuum. On this property is based its employment as a balloon gas. Later in the day the interesting phenomenon of "Leidenfrost" was given in some ingenious apparatus, which several times during the lecture exhibited the phenomenon of water in a globular form. Water in this form was shown by means of the air-pump that water boils at a lower temperature in a vacuum than in the open air. Professor Frankland stated that that water is continually passing into vapour at ordinary temperatures, and that the layer of water which thus exists above the surface of water is continually lure, receiving and retaining the heat-rays of the sun. The lecture concluded with experiments on chemically pure or distilled water, and mineral and other impure waters. The various impurities contained in fresh waters are eventually deposited in the sea, whence they go into vapour by evaporation; hence it is considered that sea water is becoming more charged with salts. Professor Frankland, in his next lecture, will enter still more fully, as it course, he had been able to point out only a few of the interesting and important phenomena connected with the subject of water and hydrogen.

The following courses of lectures will begin next week:—Tuesday, Professor Odling, "On Animal Chemistry;" Thursday, Professor Tyndall, "On Chemical Affinity;" Saturday, Professor Savory, "On Life and Death." The Friday evening lecture will be given by Professor Tyndall, "On Radiation through the Earth's Atmosphere."

A Madrid paper states that a steam-carriage for common roads has been tried with complete success.

A member of the Belgian Central Society of Agriculture has recommended to the public a newly-discovered variety of the potato, which is remarkable in the triple point of view of being productive, early, fertility of soil, and capable in a variety of what is called chariot in Belgium. Its stalk grows to the height of 2ft. 6in., and bears many bunches of flowers. It is a truly vivid color, and produces no fruit. A field of one acre of third-class quality recently produced 12,000 kilogrammes of potatoes. The neighbouring farmers were astonished not only at the enormous produce, but at the absence of any unsound potato. The crop was dug on Oct. 12.

A letter from Bagdad, in the Moniteur, says:—"The excavations carried on among the ruins of Babylon, under the direction of the French Consul at Bagdad, have resulted in some interesting discoveries. In the Nimrond Mourid, which was visited by Mr. Layard in 1840, were found four bas-reliefs of colossal dimensions, each sculptured on a large slab of stone, and representing allegorical figures. The greater part of the bas-reliefs bear long inscriptions in cuneiform character. Its remarkable for their state of preservation. A certain number of other sculptures of smaller dimensions, representing scenes of Assyrian life or warlike episodes, have also been discovered. These artistic treasures are on their way to Europe.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Mr. Baron Wilde has recovered his health, and resumes his seat on the Bench.

Three fires occurred at Putney on the night of the 9th inst., doing trifling injury to property; but in each case a child's life was lost.

It is the intention of the directors of the Agricultural Hall at Islington to hold a dog show in it during the ensuing Epsom week, and to guarantee the prizes.

Last week the births of 1554 children—1024 boys and 930 girls—were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1852-61 the average number (corrected) was 1510.—The deaths in London last week were 1158, and were nearly the same in number as those of the previous week. The average number of deaths in the second week of the ten years 1851-60 is, with a correction for increasing population, 1179. Of eight metropolitan districts, whose deaths are recorded, the oldest was a widow, aged ninety-six years.

The formal made to the guarantors of the International Exhibition and others to purchase Captain Fowke's structure, with the view of rendering it a fine art permanent building, resulted last week in a failure to have received but little support, and to have been finally abandoned. The future destiny of the building, therefore, remains uncertain, and various schemes are being mooted for the settlement of the point. One of these is that the Government should come to some arrangement with the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851, and at once relieve them and those interested in the sale of the British Museum building of all their embarrassment and anxiety.

Our present system of dealing with convicts was under discussion on the 12th inst., at meetings of the Juridical Society and the Law Amendment Society. At the Juridical Society's meeting Mr. Worsley read a paper, in which he denounced the ticket-of-leave system. He proposed to remove from the Executive the power of interfering with the duration of the sentence, and to repeal the Summary Jurisdiction Act. These opinions were opposed to and favour in the meeting. At the Law Amendment Society's meeting a paper was read by Mr. Commissioner Hill, who also read, in which he advocated the system of ticket-of-leave. The system was necessary, but that it had failed in consequence of the unwise manner in which it had been administered.

On the 12th inst., the day appointed for proroguing the Imperial Parliament was performed by the Lord Chancellor, the chief of the commission appointed by her Majesty for that purpose. Lord Campbell was accordingly found his seat on the woolsack, with the customary formalities, by virtue of the commission, declared to be at an end. His great task was now accomplished, and Parliament should be again prorogued until the day thereon named, and it would then commence its arduous and engrossing duties for the year. It was unnecessary, upon which day it would assemble for the dispatch of "divers urgent and important affairs." The Peers present on this occasion were simply one dozen, a number many minutes, and there were but few persons present.

The trial of the six persons charged with having been connected with the publication of the Englishman paper from the Lowenstein Mills, and with forging Bank of England notes, was brought to a close on the 10th inst. by the jury, without quitting the box, returning a verdict of guilty, although in the case of the latter Mr. Justice Byles stated that there could be no doubt that he had been completely deceived by the others, and that he had only escaped by a law in the evidence. Griffiths, who seems to have carried on a regular system of engraving apparently with the intention of passing it on a private scale, was sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude; Burcher, who was the main agent in putting the forged paper into circulation, to ten years' penal servitude; Hannay, who printed it, was promoted the robbery of the Bank paper, to twenty years' penal servitude; and Wilkinson, a member of the gang, who was also engaged in the description of punishment.

The Metropolitan Railway Company propose to take Parliamentary powers to purchase additional lands for the purpose of their undertaking, and for enlarging their powers of compulsory purchase in certain of respect of the Bishopsgate section of Western extension. Also, in the parish of Paddington, near the junction of South Wharf-road with Praed-street, and adjoining to the Great Western Railway, where it crosses with Conduit-street, and also as to the incomplete portions, comprising the line of extension intended from Praed-street, Paddington, and Edgware-road to the Great Western. The particular lands and properties proposed to be taken are in the parish of St. Mary Abbott's, Kensington, and are bounded by Conduit-street, Bathe Moorfield, New Union-street, Moor-lane, and Tenter-street; and between Whitecross-street and the Old Street-road, on both sides of the line in relation to Finsbury Railway, and between Vine-court and Maidenhead-court, adjacent to Moorfields, and Vine-court and Maidenhead-court, adjacent to Moorfields, St. Sepulchre and Liberty of Glasshouse-yard are in and near Cowcross-street and Sharp-street, in the parish of St. James's, Clerkenwell, and in the parish of the clinic of deviation declared by the Finsbury-circus Extension Act. These are Bonhill-street, Finsbury, and intervening properties between Bonhill-street, and Crondall-street.

LAW AND POLICE.—The 12th inst., being the first day of Hilary Term, a number of law were opened.

In the Court of Arches, it has been intimated to Dr. Lushington that appeals for a new trial in the case in which he was plaintiff, and Sir George Grey defendant. The action, it may be remembered, was brought to recover damages from Sir George Grey, in consequence of the publication by the plaintiff alleged, to present a petition of right to the Queen. The verdict was for the defendant, and if Sir George Grey presented the petition, the Queen's application was refused.

An important case, involving the possession of a large amount of property, has come before Vice-Chancellor Sir W. P. Wood. The plaintiff is the Right Hon. George Augustus Frederick Earl of Egmont, and the defendants are the Rev. William Lionel Darell, Bart., and Harriet Mary, his wife; Mary Tierney, widow; and Mary Anne Darell (an infant). Plaintiff's Mary Isabella Darell, and the Right Hon. Spencer Horatio Walpole; Charles Spencer Perceval; Thomas M'Mahon; and Jane Terry. The question at issue is the validity of the will of Henry Darell, late of Sarsoot, the plaintiff's grandfather, for the purpose of estates within the jurisdiction of the Court, to the defendants, or those whom they represent. It has been admitted by the heir-at-law, the present plaintiff, but he is not by an allegation that the deceased Earl, by his will, bequeathed the equity of redemption of the following property, of the estimated value of £850, and upwards. A similar suit is pending in Ireland, and the object of the present bill is that the two suits may be consolidated and heard together.

A man named John Povey, who describes himself as a gambler by profession, was tried and convicted two or three months ago at the Central Criminal Court of the offence of stealing a purse, containing a considerable sum of money, from the pocket of Lord Ingestre. He was sentenced to be kept in penal servitude for six years. He was removed to Newgate, and a few days ago it was discovered that he had got some money, and was preparing to take out a pond in his cell door, which opens upon the corridor, and that he had very ingeniously contrived to hide his place with soap. Search was then made known to the governor, and the prisoner was subjected to a rigorous search; but he had succeeded in secreting the sum of £855, the whole of which being composed of bank notes of £100, £50, and £5, and five sovereigns. The prisoner was searched, and was carefully watched, but he was not free from apprehension and after he had been committed to Newgate. How he became possessed of the money is not known, but here is no doubt that he intended to be employed in an attempt to bribe the officers to connive at or assist in his escape. The money is to go to the Crown, as entitled to it under the Act for Corporation of London.

At Guildford, on the 10th inst., a railway contractor, named William Backwell, lately living at Greenwich, and more recently in Italy, where he had been employed as engineer for a railway between Genoa and Novi, on which he was charged with not surrendering to his bankruptcy on the day fixed for his last examination. The bankrupt's liabilities amounted to £70,000. The warrant for his apprehension was placed in the hands of Sergeant Hayden, of the detective force, and he arrived at the prisoner's retreat at Shere, on the 7th of August. As, however, there was no treaty between this country and Italy, it was necessary for Hayden to obtain the assistance of the local authorities, and the aid of a company of Carbineers, under the direction of the Questura. The bankrupt, who was concealed between the ceiling and the roof of his house, was then lodged in prison, and after some negotiation with the authorities it was arranged that he should be sent to this country and there discharged. Upon this Hayden started off for the frontier, and was ready waiting for the arrival of the Lord Clyde, accompanied by three Italian gendarmes. Another difficulty, however, arose in consequence of the Italians refusing to allow the bankrupt signed a particular document absolving the Italian authorities from the consequences of an illegal arrest. They lay under no obligation to do so. The prisoner, while the Carbineers were on the other hand, stated that they had orders to shoot the prisoner if he attempted to escape. After much delay, during which the vessel was nearly frozen in the snow, the bankrupt decided to return to England, in preference to a renewed incarceration in an Italian prison.

Mr. F. Oliver, late bandmaster of the third battalion 60th Rifles, stationed at Thoptkopje, Burmah, has received from the host and buglers of that corps a handsome memento, consisting of a silver goblet and salver, of Burmese make and design.

The distress from the dearth of cotton is great in various parts of Austria; but at Reichenberg, in Bohemia, "the cotton-spinners," says the Vienna correspondent of the Times, "have not the means of keeping soul and body together."

A telegram from Alexandria states that the Viceroy of Egypt has placed at the disposal of France eight hundred negro slaves. They are to be embarked in a French war-steamer and dispatched to Mexico.

THE SPRING CIRCUITS FOR 1863.

THE Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer have chosen their different circuits as follow:—

HOME CIRCUIT.—The Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and Mr. Justice Wightman.

NORFOLK CIRCUIT.—Lord Chief Justice Erle and Mr. Justice Williams.

MIDLAND CIRCUIT.—The Lord Chief Baron Pollock and Mr. Justice Willes.

OXFORD CIRCUIT.—Mr. Justice Crompton and Mr. Justice Channell.

WESTERN CIRCUIT.—Mr. Justice Byles and Mr. Baron Wilde.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—Mr. Baron Martin and Mr. Justice Keating.

NORTH WALES.—Mr. Baron Bramwell.

SOUTH WALES.—Mr. Justice Mellor.

Mr. Justice Blackburn will stay in town and transact business at Judges' Chambers during the absence of the other learned judges.

A telegram from Bombay, of the 27th ult., announces the withdrawal, by the Government, of Contract Bill.

The Chroniqueur des Arts states that Prince Napoleon has exchanged his Roman villa in the Champs Elysées with Prince de Demidof, and he forwards to the latter, by the shortest route, the will he will leave that Prince de Demidoff had formed, in the house in which the Emperor resided during his exile in London, and which he purchased.

A banquet was given at Alexandria by English merchants on the 31st ult., to Sir Henry Bulwer, as British Ambassador to the Porte. His Excellency, in reply to his entertainers, enlarged on the importance of India, the East, and with considerable emphasis laboured to impress the party with the enormous value to foreign Powers of peace with the Government of Egypt. He could ever be tolerated by England. His Excellency alluded but slightly to the intimate friendship he had always entertained for Mehemet Ali, and which betrayed an unwillingness to dwell unnecessarily upon probabilities only calculated to provoke feelings of international discord or irritation.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

THE continued shortage of the supplies of bullion and of the precious metals for export purposes, and the withdrawal of over £200,000 in gold from the vaults of England, Scotland, and Ireland, during the week, for the purchase of the stock of bullion in the Bank of France, have had some influence upon the markets for these articles. The value of silver has not materially changed to some extent, and prices have, consequently, ruled somewhat lower than in the previous week. The quotations for Spanish doubloons, American eagles, and twenty-franc pieces, on the whole, the quotations have been fairly supported. The Unfunded debt has slightly increased.

The supply of money in the general discount market is abundant; nevertheless, the demand for loanable capital has been somewhat active, and the lowest rates for the best paper are now as follows:—

Thirty days' bills	.. .. 3½ to — per cent.	Four months' bills ..	4½ to 4¾ per cent.
Two months' bills	.. .. 4 to 4¼ ,,	Six months' bills ..	4¾ to 5 ,,
Three months' bills	.. .. 4 to 4½ ,,

At the usual meeting of the Directors of the Bank of England, held on Thursday, the minimum rate of discount was advanced to four per cent. This rate was followed, on the same day, by several of the joint-stock banks and discount houses. The Joint-Stock Banks are now giving 3 per cent for money at call, and 3½ per cent for short loans.

On the Continent capital has ruled very firm in price. We annex the quotations in the leading cities:—

	Bank rate.	Open market.		Bank rate.	Open market.
	per cent.	per cent.		per cent.	per cent.
Paris	4	3½	Amsterdam	3	2½
Berlin	5	4½	Hamburg	4	3½
Berlin	5	4½	Frankfort	4	3½
Vienna	5	4½	St. Petersburg ..	5	5

The total imports of the precious metals have amounted to about £150,000, and the whole of the same has been received from the United States of the gold now on passage from Australia is about £645,000, and the next two steamers are due with about £300,000 more. The rate of the New York exchange comes at 147½ 148, and the premium on gold 3¾ per cent. There has been no change in silver.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE, Jan. 12.—There was a very poor show of English wheat on sale here to-day. Selected samples commanded very full prices, but the trade ruled very dull in every, as sales were extremely narrow. Foreign wheat was in fair demand, and fine milling sorts however, commanded very little attention. No quotable change took place in the value of malt. The barley trade was very dull. Prices were in favour of buyers. In our quarter, and other kinds were tolerably firm. Both beans and peas sold slowly, at the late decline in the value of the former article.

Monday, 14—and very little change in the value of any kind of produce to-day. Generally speaking, the trade ruled inactive.

English Wheat, Essex and Kent, 40s to 54s; ditto, white, 42s to 56s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 42s to 54s; ditto, white, 44s to 56s; grinding barley, 26s to 28s; distilling ditto, 30s to 32s; malting ditto, 34s to 36s; Lincoln and Norfolk, 36s to 38s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, 36s to 38s; Scotch, 36s to 38s; Chevalier, 40s to 44s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 19s to 23s; potato ditto, 23s to 26s; Youghal and Cork, black, 16s to 18s; ditto, white, 16s to 18s; Galway, 20s to 22s; Sligo, 20s to 22s; Limerick, 20s to 22s; tick beans, 30s to 32s; grey peas, 32s to 34s; maple, 34s to 36s; Egyptian beans, 30s to 32s; Lincoln and Norfolk, 32s to 34s; Yorkshire, 32s to 34s; Scotch, 32s to 34s; Harlings, 32s to 34s; Foreign, 32s to 34s; Indian corn, 30s to 32s; white ditto, 32s to 34s; flour, 40s to 44s.

Pork, Mess, 80s to 82s; Prime Mess, 90s to 92s; Prime Cargo, 70s to 72s; Mess, 74s to 76s per bbl. Bacon, 54s to 56s; Middles, 52s to 54s per cwt. Lard, 54s to 56s per cwt. Butter, Cork, 104s to 106s; Limerick, 104s to 106s; Waterford, 104s to 106s; Friesland, 104s to 106s; Kiel, 104s to 106s per cwt. Cheese, 52s to 54s; Cheshire, 56s to 58s; Double Gloucester, 52s to 54s; Single ditto, 48s to 50s per cwt.

Tea.—The demand for all kinds is quiet, at about previous currencies.

Sugar.—The market for raw sugar is heavy, and prices are barely supported. Refined goods have ruled dull, at late rates.

Coffee.—The demand is almost wholly confined to small parcels; nevertheless, the currencies are firm, although the stock is large for the time of year.

Rice.—Fine sorts are in good request, and steady, at very full prices. Inferior kinds support late rates. Bengal, fine, 15s 6d to 16s; ditto, middling, 14s 6d to 15s per cwt. Carolina, on board. Hams, lard, and other provisions rule about stationary.

Spices.—Pepper, 4½d to 5d per lb. Cassia lignea, 30s per cwt. Ginger, 40s to 42s. Nutmegs, 2s 6d to 3s 6d per lb. Cloves, 6s 6d to 7s per lb. Cassia buds, 4s 6d per lb.

Saltpetre.—The demand for refined is fair for the season, at late prices. Crude is dull for export. Refined goods, 24s to 25s per cwt. Crude, 20s to 21s per cwt.

Spirits.—Rum, 1s 10d to 2s per gallon. Brandy, 2s to 2s 2d per gallon. Proof Leewards, 1s 9d to 1s 10d; proof East India, 1s 4d to 1s 5d per gallon. Brandy is worth, 2s to 11s 9d; Hollands, 1s 6d to 1s 7d per gallon. Geneva, 1s 4d to 1s 5d per gallon. Irish, 20 o.p., 12s 6d per gallon. Malt, 2s 6d to 2s 9d per gallon.

Potatoes.—In supplies moderate, and the demand for the article is inactive, at from 4s to 11s per ton.

Manchester Goods Market (Thursday, Jan. 15).—Notwithstanding that the show of heavily goods has been on a very limited scale, the market has generally ruled somewhat lower, and has been nearly equal to Monday. The extreme value of the best makes has been 5s. per 81b. The supply of shops was very moderate, and the demand for them was quiet. Buyers and sellers were both off freely, at full quotations; but all letter heads were a dull inquiry, at late rates. In Manchester, on Wednesday, the market was very dull, and prices were in favour of buyers. In Glasgow, on the same day, the market was dull, at late rates. Mid. Orleans, 8½ to 8¾; fair, 8¾ to 9; good, 9¼ to 9½; fine, 9¾ to 10; good fair, 9¾ to 10; fine, 10¼ to 10½; middling, 8¼ to 8½

DAVOUD PACHA,
GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF MOUNT LEBANON.

After the civil war in Mount Lebanon between the Christian and Druse sects, during the summer of 1860, the Sultan's Government, as well as the five great Powers of Europe, were in no small degree puzzled as to how this vast district should be governed for the future. It was proposed at first to select one of the native princes of the country; but, owing to sectarian disputes and jealousies, this became a simple impossibility. The population of Mount Lebanon amounts to about 400,000 souls, divided into six sects—Maronites, Greeks, Greek Catholics, Druses, Moslems, and Metualis—all hating each other, and all determined not to be ruled over by any member of another creed who is a native of the mountain. The great majority of the population is Christian; and this fact, together with the recollection of the help given to the Druse sect by certain Turkish officials during the civil war of 1860, made it almost impossible for the Porte to place a Moslem as ruler over Lebanon. It was therefore decided by the representatives of the great Powers, as also by the Sultan's Commissioners, that the mountain should be governed by a Christian, named by the Porte, but not a native of Lebanon. The unanimous choice fell upon Davoud Effendi, who was then the Director-General of Telegraphs throughout the Turkish Empire, whose Portrait we here give, and who thenceforth became Davoud Pacha, the first Christian ever raised to the rank of Muchier, which is the third or highest rank of Pacha.

Davoud Pacha has, by all accounts, shown himself fully worthy of the great trust reposed in him by his Imperial master. From a state of utter confusion and anarchy into which the hereditary native feudal chiefs had brought the Lebanon, he has, in little more than a year, brought the Government into something like order, and throughout his pachalic life and property are as safe as in the best organised countries in Europe. The Christian population of the Lebanon submit cheerfully to Davoud Pacha because he is a Christian, whilst the Druses, Moslems, and Metualis are obedient to him because he is named by the Porte and is not a Christian of the Lebanon.

Incred Davoud Pacha is a Catholic Armenian (that is, of the sect of Armenians who, whilst retaining their own ancient rites and ceremonies, are in communion with the Roman Catholic Church); but, although a sincere and even devout member of his own church, is by no means a bigot, and has placed no obstacles in the way of Protestant schools or missionaries in the mountain. Wherever amongst the natives of Lebanon he has found persons of education and intelligence he has employed them, no matter to what creed they belong; and in more than one instance he has braved the outcries of fanatic Catholics or Greeks, and employed native Protestants in the service of Government. Amongst others he has on his personal staff and employed in the police corps of the Lebanon an English officer formerly in the English cavalry, a French officer who belonged to the Chasseurs à Pied, and a Hungarian officer.

The subject of this brief memoir was born at Constantinople in March, 1816. He belongs to one of the oldest Christian families in Turkey, and which suffered during the persecutions of 1827. He has been no less than twenty-eight years in the service of the Porte, having, after a complete University course at Berlin, commenced his official career as professor of modern languages in the Ottoman Military College of Constantinople. He afterwards entered the diplomatic line as Secretary to the Ottoman Embassy at Berlin, then at Vienna, and afterwards at Paris, whence he returned to Berlin as Charge d'Affaires, which post he held at various times for a period of nine years. In 1854 he accompanied Ali Pacha as chief secretary to the Conference of Vienna. In 1855 he was Imperial Commissioner for the question of the navigation of the Danube, and in 1858 went as chief secretary with Fuad Pacha to the Conference of Paris. In the following year he was named Director-General of Telegraphs, and under his auspices all the great lines of telegraphic communications now long completed throughout the Turkish empire were commenced. In 1861 he was selected by the Porte and the five Powers to fill the very difficult post of Governor-General of the Lebanon, with the rank of Muchir, or Pacha of the highest grade, and is the first Christian ever named to that rank under the Sublime Porte. Davoud Pacha speaks French, English, Italian, and German, and has, in the first of these languages, published a history of the seven years' war, which is well spoken of. He in former years gained more than one great prize medal, &c., by his writings and dissertations before the Berlin University, and is a Member of the Academy of Science in that city.

TABLE BAY PATENT SLIP.

TABLE BAY, an inlet of the Atlantic Ocean in Southern Africa, is capable of sheltering the largest fleets, and, except from June to August, always affords safe anchorage. Cape Town, the capital of Cape Colony, lies on its south-west shore, and at its back is Table Mountain, so conspicuous in our Engraving. A patent slip has recently been constructed in Table Bay by Messrs. De Pass, Spence, and Co., and Messrs. Robert Granger and Co. Erected on the sheltered side of the breakwater, it is capable of taking up ships of 2000 tons. The "ways" are fastened to the solid rock. The cradle is made of the best teak wood. Steam power is employed to haul ships up. Competent judges have pronounced it the best and largest work of the kind ever undertaken. Our Engraving shows the Australian Navigation Company's fine paddle-steamer Coonanbara under repair on the patent slip. She was supplied with a new rudder and all the steering apparatus, which she lost in a tremendous gale off the Cape while on her voyage from London to Sydney. This is the fifth vessel that has been on the slip since it was opened for use a month or two ago. The Coonanbara weighed, with her coals, stores, and machinery, upwards of 1000 tons, and her length resting on the slip was upwards of 210ft. This thoroughly tested the efficiency of the ways and machinery of the slip, which, however, is capable of taking up much larger vessels.

WALLER'S TOMB AT BEACONSFIELD.

THE beautiful tomb at Beaconsfield, erected by his son to Edmund Waller, the poet, has, at last, been restored by Mr. Henry Harley, statuary, of Windsor, at the cost and pursuant to the directions of WALLER'S TOMB AT BEACONSFIELD, BUCKINGHAMSHIRE, RECENTLY RESTORED.

Mr. H. E. Waller, of Farmington, Gloucestershire, the poet's descendant and representative. The renovation has been most carefully and creditably executed by Mr. Harley, and the tomb of black and white marble now stands out in all its pristine beauty—a magnificent memorial, well worthy of that admiration which Dr. Johnson once bestowed upon it. The elegant Latin inscriptions by Rymer of the Fœdera are visible again, and the area around the tomb is repaired, embracing in its precinct, the fine walnut-tree which overhangs the monument, and recalls the Wallers, an ancient and time-honoured family, that tree being their crest. The whole is a striking object, and, combined with the tablets to Edmund Burke, who lies buried in the church close by, forms a double attraction to all who may wish to visit the shrines of the mighty dead. In an article in the first series of his "Vicissitudes," Sir Bernard Burke thus speaks of Edmund Waller and his tomb:—

"An earlier sojourn of genius in Beaconsfield has left a memory there, not so venerable, it is true, as that of Edmund Burke, yet most pleasant to dwell upon—a memory which, with strange tenacity, attaches to the place far more closely, and with far more visible marks, than even the memory of Burke. The genius we allude to was Edmund Waller, the first lyric poet of his time, and the worthy precursor of Robert Burns, and Tom Moore, and the other great lyrists that were to succeed. Beaconsfield was the favourite and constant residence of Waller in his lifetime (his splendid seat, Hall Barn, still remains), and it is, in death, his last earthly resting-place. Edmund Waller's stately tomb in Beaconsfield Churchyard tells us, in most graceful Latinity, that he was 'of the poets of his time easily the Prince; that when an octogenarian he did not abdicate the laurel he had won in his youth; and that his country's language owes to him the possible belief that, if the Muses should cease to speak Greek and Latin, they would love to talk in English.' This epitaph records the truth. Waller may claim rank among our greatest poets, and he had the rare faculty of never varying in his talent, and of writing just as ably at all periods of his life, whether in youth, manhood, or age.

"Waller's tomb was the work of filial affection, having been raised by his son at a costly expense. . . . The poet well deserves this sacred memorial who could, when in his extreme old age, and close upon his death, write such lines as these:—

> The sun's not quiet when the winds give o'er;
> So, calm are we, when passions are no more;
> For then we know how vain it was to boast
> Of fleeting things, so certain to be lost.
> Clouds of affection from our younger eyes
> Conceal that emptiness which age descries;
> The soul's dark cottage, batter'd and decay'd,
> Lets in new light through chinks that time has made;
> Stronger by weakness, wiser men become,
> As they draw near to their eternal home;
> Leaving the old, both worlds at once they view,
> That stand upon the threshold of the new."

The present venerable Rector of Beaconsfield, the Rev. John Gould, D.D., now in his eighty-third year, has long been creditably active in his exertions to preserve and renovate the tombs and memorials, within his parish, of Burke and Waller, and it must be gratifying to him that so much has been done in his time by the kinsmen and namesakes of each notability. But it is still to be desired that this plan of monuments to great people being restored by their descendants should be more generally inculcated and carried out. It seems, for instance—Chelsea is much needed in many places. Take one, for instance—Chelsea, where, in the old churchyard, Sir Hans Sloane's fine tomb is perishing for want of repair: a fact, we are sure, which need only be made known to his descendants and inheritors of his wealth to be duly known to his descendants and inheritors of his wealth to be duly attended to by their affectionate gratitude. Our Engraving of Waller's tomb is taken from a sketch by Mrs. Hughes, of Gwersylas.

STATUE OF GENERAL SIR WILLIAM NAPIER, K.C.B.

SCULPTURED BY G. G. ADAMS. IN ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

A SECOND member of the illustrious family of Napier has just received monumental commemoration in St. Paul's Cathedral. It has stated to the country that Sir William Napier, the historian of the Peninsular War, was placed a week or two ago close to the principal door of the entrance, and opposite a composition statue to that of Sir William's gallant brother Sir Charles Napier, who "Conquest," and "Administration of Scinde" Sir William wrote, and described so ably and affectionately. For his literary rather than military achievements will this Napier be chiefly remembered. Military abilities, however, of no common kind Sir William doubtlessly possessed. It is proved by his conduct in the successive campaigns in the Spanish peninsula, as a simple Captain of a company, as Aide-de-Camp to Sir John Moore, and to the 43rd Regiment; at Almeida and Busaco, in and as Commander of the 43rd Regiment; at Almeida and Busaco, in the various combats following Massena's retreat; and at Fuentes d'Onore, the subsequent actions and Badossa, at the Nivelle and the Nive, and at Orthes; but still more is it proved by the knowledge of the principles of strategy displayed in his work. Had Sir William never commanded an army, and his personal bravery and the wounds he received are not therefore considered worthy of record, he would have fired with the same energy and ability the subject with the most charming and inspiriting effect.

The marble now erected to this gifted and brave man is the colossal in size (measuring 8ft. 6in. high), and is the result of a public subscription. As a work of art it is creditable to Mr. Adams, but the sculptor and composer very unadvisedly not only with the companion statue of Sir Charles, which is also by Mr. Adams, but with most of the works by this artist exhibited in St. Paul's—the figure is in proper costume, and a military cloak backs the statue in his proper costume, and a military cloak backs the statue in his proper figure, supported chiefly by the right shoulder. The figure is firm upon the base, the base well balanced, principally on the left leg; the right leg is flexed and the foot slightly advanced, giving a sense of pausing rather than progress. The head, resting on the sword and the right holding the scroll appropriately indicate the double character of General and Commander-in-Chief. A pile of the Victor's wreaths stands on the back of the pedestal. It may, perhaps, be objected by some critics that the drapery is treated too broadly, and especially the upper forms which the cloak has been given more definitely. Better, however, emptiness itself in these unimportant parts than that slavishly minute copying of every folds and are faithfully rendered. To us the happiest part, or rather characteristic, of the statue is the pose of the head, which is a little turned back, and, like a portrait statue, turned considerably on one side. This at once removes that tameness which is the almost constant fault of the full face in the class, and is suggestive of a little energy of the personage represented. We can fancy that a vivid recollection of some exciting scene has suddenly invited Sir William to look behind him, the half-consciousness of its having occurred far away, the eyes involuntarily turn aside to search the distance or the past, and that, while looking into the eye, the head is at the same time slightly retracted, is of equally involuntarily to raise what might prove, after all, only a fleeting image. The gesture by which action is suggested, common to a literary men, especially novelists and descriptive writers of all kinds.

NEW CHURCH AT NOCTON, LINCOLNSHIRE.

THE greater portion of the village of Nocton belongs to the Countess of Ripon, and for some years her Ladyship has had it in contemplation to erect a new church as a memorial to her late husband, the Earl of Ripon. Some time ago instructions were given to Mr. George Gilbert Scott, who preserved suitable designs, which, with the exception of the old church was pulled down, and Mr. William Huddleston, of Lincoln, was engaged to erect the new edifice. We understand (says the Lincoln Gazette, from which these particulars are abbreviated), that originally the church joined the old hall, but, being in a dilapidated condition, it was razed to the ground as it was not in view of the village, as a convenient distance from the mansion, about a century ago. The second church, which was built by Mr. Fraser, his predecessor, was dedicated to All Saints, that being the day on which the late Earl was born. The church is built on the old site, but is extended a few feet south, east, and west, and is one of the most beautiful churches in the county of Lincoln. It is in the Early Decorated style, and consists of nave, chancel, north aisle, and apsidal chancel, with heating-vault underneath. The lower part of the tower forms the entrance or porch, on account of the whole of the village being situated to the east of the church. The tower is rather low boiler windows, and is intended to be carried out at some future time and surmounted with a spire. The height of the tower is 50ft.

The exterior of the church is built of finely hammer-dressed native walling-stone: the whole of the dressings, internal and external, are of Ancaster stone. On the north side of the tower the foundations of a future aisle are put in, and the arcade is placed in the new south wall, so that the whole of it can be removed with very little trouble. The clerestory windows are also introduced on the south side. The whole of the roofs are of Memel timber, and nine-drawn between the rafters are laid and covered with plain and ornamental Broseley bridled tiles, and surmounted with an ornamental Staffordshire ridge. The nave and chancel roofs are open-timbered with lead.

The whole of the inside walls are finished in rough stucco; the nave and chancel seats are of pitch pine, and are all open, the chancel seats being elaborately carved, and the whole of them stained and varnished. The communion-rail is of oak, and has been executed in Ancaster, red, Mansfield, and Caen stone, with green polished marble shaft to the angles; the inside panels is metal and brass, and the lectern is of wainscot oak, and is very elaborately carved, being one of the most delicate productions in the county of Lincoln. The chancel floor is laid down with encaustic glazed tiles, of a very handsome pattern; the remainder of the floors are paved with Godfrey's four-inch tiles, laid in diagonal patterns. The whole of the windows are glazed with smooth cathedral glass, slightly tinted, and the ventilation is on the principle of Mouse's patent. The tracery is glazed in geometrical patterns, and the screen between the vestry and chapel is of metal and brass. The font is of Caen stone, with seven marble shafts, and stands at the west end of the nave. The capitals of the pillars between the chancel and the mortuary chapel are very elaborately carved, one in imitation of the passion flower, and the two respond capitals in imitation of the rose and the lily. All the carving, internally and externally, is in imitation of natural foliage. The internal shafts of the windows of the chancel, chapel, and west end of the nave are of Derbyshire polished marble. The tower arch, tower, belfry, vestry, and mortuary-vault, are all framed of pitch pine, covered on the outside with oak boards, hung with elaborate wrought-iron ornamental bands. The altar-cloth is of elaborate needlework, the prevailing colours of which are blue and gold. A handsome little organ has been built.

In the interior of the church there is a splendid monument erected to the memory of the late Earl of Ripon, executed by Mr. M. Noble. The tomb stands about 4ft. high, and is some 7ft. in length and about a yard wide: it is of Devonshire marble and Bath stone, with splendid ornaments and medallions. This portion of it is from designs made by Mr. Scott. Upon the top is the figure of the Earl, lying in a sad recumbent position, in his peer's robes, the head resting upon a cushion, the whole of the figure, from the pedestal to the marble. The likeness, which is said to be admirable, was executed from a cast taken after death.

The cost of the church, up to the present time, is upwards of £5000, and of course the expense of the tower and spire will be considerable. The work has been carried out in a manner which redounds to the credit of Mr. Huddleston: it is also to the entire satisfaction of the Dowager Countess of Ripon and the Vicar of the parish.

The churchyard has been enclosed with iron railings on all sides, and is inclosed by a neat stone coped wall. On the north side is a sycamore tree, which is to be preserved, as it is a fine specimen. This tree has been strictly attended to. Around the tree a wall has been built after the style of a sunk fence, so that the earth cannot fall upon the trunk to cause it to decay.

The church has recently been consecrated by the Bishop of Lincoln.

OPENING OF THE METROPOLITAN RAILWAY.

THE inaugural ceremony connected with the opening of the much-talked-of and long-projected Metropolitan Railway was celebrated on the 9th inst. by an experimental trip and a subsequent banquet at the Farringdon-street station. Full as long ago since the first practical steps towards the realisation of the idea, the success of which is now so triumphantly established, is due to Mr. Charles Pearson, the solicitor for many years to the Corporation of London, whose property it first originating it. Of the difficulties which opposed the scheme which Mr. Pearson proposed, it is the offspring of his original project, and therefore to his name should the credit chiefly be accorded, for to him it owes its life to be completed. The early struggles of the company were enormous, and more than once the scheme was on the point of being hopelessly abandoned. It was finally abandoned for ever had it not been for the well-founded and universal outcry at the impediments to circulation in London arising from the narrowness of the thoroughfares.

It was the consideration that induced the Corporation of the City to advance £200,000 to the company. The Act empowers the City the use of the Great Western and Great Northern Companies, enabled the present company to begin the work with a fair prospect of success. The Act, as we have already stated, empowers we only overcome. There remained the great and novel task of borrowing under ground, and the difficulties and dangers of sinking wells, of working in the midst of water-pipes, gaspipes, sewers, mains, and cloches. Those who may use the line will never be able to appreciate the skill, the labour, the danger and the stupendous resources which were exerted in this part of the undertaking. The public will, however, sufficiently find an adequate description of the difficulties which were encountered in this underground world of London. In Mr. Jay's part of the contract between the Metropolitan Railway Company and the latter of this formidable barrier: after heavy rains during the progress of the work the mass of the earth above the tunnel became loose and liable to slip. The great undertaking is, however, accomplished; and, for the first time in the history of the world, men can ride in pleasant carriages, and with considerable speed, through a subterranean way, with water-pipes, and besides sewers and mains.

The preliminary trip was made on the 9th inst., trains, bearing about 650 invited passengers, started from Paddington about one o'clock and proceeded along the line to Farringdon-street, passing the two intermediate stations, Bishop's-road and Edgware-road, satisfactory, and sanguine hopes were expressed as to the success of the undertaking.

THE BANQUET.

At the Farringdon-street station a banquet had been prepared, and was partaken of by the guests. It was held in a large room specially erected for the occasion adjoining the station. It was 200ft. long by 100ft. broad, and constructed to accommodate 700 persons, for which number tickets were issued. It was lined throughout with white calico, and the roof of the whole of the arches and stations were suspended from the ceiling and side walls. The bands of the City police were in attendance, and kept the approaches to the station free from any of the noisy enlivening airs. Amongst those present were the chairman of the company, Mr. Wilkinson, who also presided at the dinner; Mr. Pearson, Mr. Fowler, M.P., Mr. Hall, M.P., Mr. W. Wood, M.P., Mr. Ayrton, M.P., Sir S. M. Peto, M.P., Mr. H. Lewin, M.P., Mr. Bass, M.P., Mr. Pinsent, Mr. Thomas Farrer, Hill and Lady, Colonel Sir J. Hamilton, Bart., Mr. Malins, M.P., Mr. Sheriff Jones, Aldermen Sidney, M.P., Humphery, Challis, Abbis, Allan, Wilson, Lawrence, Dimsdale, Gibbons, Cubitt, Carter, Lawrence. Several interesting speeches were made, some of them containing valuable information respecting the progress of the undertaking. Mr. the engineer of the company, in replying to a toast, said he carefully felt somewhat proud at the result of that day's proceedings. They had accomplished what was considered impossible. They had proved thereby showed that they had brought to completion that line, which might be regarded as the commencement of the Underground Railway. In a great work of a novel character, and of which a large share of the responsibility in one department devolved on him. He called it the first experiment, for he (Mr. Fowler) considered the completion of the Finsbury-circus, and not where they were now assembled. Having referred to the difficulties which had attended the undertaking, he said it was at first contemplated to work the trains by atmospheric traction; but, having to consider that system, he reported that, however beautiful and perfect, the atmospheric system had not been used, and it was necessary to have a new one. He prepared the models of the present engines, and the construction of the whole of the engine made upon that model, with some slight modifications of detail, was now in use on the line. He believed it would be found that it worked well. While it gave the necessary power, it was also smokeless. The object accomplished, he believed, was worth all the difficulties encountered, and he was glad to see that the Underground Railway was only the means of relieving the traffic of the city of London and connect the railway lines on the north side of the Thames, by which passengers from the north will, by means of the London, Chatham, and Dover line. He must say, on behalf of the directors, that they Johnson Johnson, the resident engineer, and Mr. Jay, the contractor, received valuable assistances from Mr. Johnson, the resident engineer, and was well supported by the contractor. The result was, that the greatest unbelievers must now be convinced of the practicability of the line. Mr. Farrer, the deputy-chairman of the company, in proposing "The health of Mr. Pearson," said—"I am convinced it cannot be said that he was the principal officer," said:—The company felt that they were under a deep debt of gratitude to the Corporation for their munificent subscription of £200,000 towards the construction of an undertaking so novel in its nature. He hoped they would be recompensed by a return of interest for their money. He could not refrain from paying by of saying how deeply he regretted that his friend Mr. Charles Pearson had not lived to see the completion of the line, which was he was the originator. In speaking of Mr. Pearson, he thought he was justified in correcting an idea which seemed to prevail—namely, that Mr. Pearson remunerated by the Metropolitan Railway Company for his services. Now, Mr. Pearson never asked for, and never received, any such remuneration, and was never connected with the Metropolitan Railway Company. And when, after it was put on its legs though his exertions, Mr. Pearson was asked how they could remunerate him for his labours, his reply was:—"I am the servant of the Corporation of London: they are my masters, and entitled to all my time and services. If you have any return to make, you must make it to them." Among the other speakers were Lord Harris, the Lord Mayor, Mr. Lowe, Sir M. Peto, and Mr. Jay, one of the contractors.

The Metropolitan Railway was fairly opened to the public on the 10th inst., and it was calculated that more than 30,000 persons were carried over the line in the course of the day. Indeed, the desire to travel by this line on the opening day was more than the directors had provided for; and from nine o'clock in the morning till past midday it was impossible to obtain a place in the up or Cityward line at any of the mid stations. In the evening the tide turned, and the crush at the Farringdon-street station was as great as at the doors of a theatre on the first night of some popular performer. Some lightening of the pressure was obtained by the Great Western lending some of their engines and carriages supplemental to the rolling stock of the company, but notwithstanding the throng, it is gratifying to add that no accident occurred, and the respect of the passengers was unanimous in favour of the smoothness and comfort of the line.

"ROSENLAUI," SWITZERLAND: WINTER—SNOW ON THE MOUNTAINS.

THE View from Rosenlaui we have engraved is the most remarkable in the neighbourhood of the great Scheideck; and, therefore, a favourite subject with the artists and also the photographers. Messrs. Bisson Bisson, Freres, have turned their attention so successfully to Alpine scenery. The View is taken from the road or path to Kreyenes; the foreground is partly in the meadow plain, carpeted with soft turf, which, especially since the very general introduction of the picturesque Swiss fire and other implements, resembles in summer an English lawn. The roughly-built Swiss chalets, all the more pleasing to the artist's eye for their irregularity, are detached or clustered; and in the distance rise the Wetterhorn, the Wellhorn, and the craggy peaks called Rosel-Horner, together forming a group almost unrivalled for picturesque beauty. The novelty of the View we also have modern is that it is the winter aspect of this noble scenery, and therefore not seen by the summer tourists, or explored even by the guides or boys attendant on the Alpine club. In such a view as this with the snow everywhere on the ground, we the more readily understand some of the peculiarities of the Alps. We see the desirability of raising the chalets clear above the snow; and can imagine that from the ever-descending ice, and the rare, heavy, and rolling snow, when there is no fear of the avalanche, it is necessary to fence the roadside; and that the winter storms which sweep these valleys would tear the roofs off the houses from the gable ends if large stones were not placed to secure them. But, after all, it is wonderful that these hardy peasants can so well endure the rigour of the winter months, and that flocks and herds, and support themselves through the long winter months, when they have little means of trading, and are shut in, as it were, in these mountain fastnesses by the outer world. The summer visitors to this locality usually halt to refresh themselves and their horses at the Rosenlaui Hotel, which is built but well over the ground close to a source of mineral water (nearer to the famous glacier of Rosenlaui), and which supplies five or six rude tubs of wood serving as baths. For these, however, resort there is no lack of guests. The winter does not, of course, make much difference in the aspect of the mountains. The Rosenlaui glacier and the Wellhorn Schnee (the Angels' Peaks) on the left afford little lodgment for the snow. Summer or winter makes no very great difference to the now hoary head of the Wetterhorn, which rises, 12,000ft. or so far away terrible Wetterhorn (the Tempest peak), or the sharp hatchet of the Rosel-Horner, more curiously called cone of the Kleinschneider, or the lower Metterberg. We may mention that from the Grindelwald side the Wetterhorn, even when its base is a mile distant, seems to overhang terribly. It rises in such stupendous and sublime precipice of Alpine limestone apparently close above the traveller's head as he looks up from the valley. Its coloured a man who, to give the effect of the echoes from the vast cliffs of the Wetterhorn, blows the Alpine horn—a rude kind of wood six or seven feet long. A few seconds after the horn has ceased the few and simple notes are returned to the ear refined and softened by passing through even an actual cone of reverberating among the crags. On the very top of the Scheideck (6711ft. above the sea) there is a chalet which affords some accommodation at certain seasons to travellers between the Wellhorn and the Engelhorner, in our Engraving, lies the remarkable Glacier of Rosenlaui. It is smaller than the glacier of the Rhone, but it is celebrated above all others in Switzerland for the unbroken purity of its white surface and the clear transparent azure of its icebergs. This peculiarity arises doubtless from the character of the rocks around it; these, in decomposing, do not turn into black gravel or mud, which stains and disfigures the Grindelwald. If the reader will refer back to the extend his knowledge of the wonderful phenomena of glaciers, their formation, flow, and effects, to the interesting article in our last Number, on the subject, or, to read Mr. James Forbes's very interesting "Travels through the Alps of Savoy," and his philosophical observations on glaciers in the same work.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of Vice-Admiral Sir Charles Sullivan, Bart., of Queen Court, Thames Ditton, late of Lisbon, proved in London by the executor, the Rev. Frederick Sullivan, Vicar of Kimpton, Herts, the testator's brother. The other executor appointed was Captain Kilkerran Sullivan, R.N., of Lincoln's-inn-fields, since deceased. The will bears date June, 1854. The Admiral died at Lisbon, who was unmarried, succeeded to the baronetcy in 1814, on the demise of his brother, Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Henry Sullivan, who died a bachelor. The present Sir Edward Sullivan, the testator's nephew and heir-at-law, succeeded by his son, the present Sir Charles Sullivan, now in his forty-third year. The testator bequeathed to his executor, Mr. Frederick Sullivan, personal, he leaves to his wife, Lady Sullivan, for her life, bequeathing to her Lady-ship for her own absolute use his furniture, plate, jewels, and other effects, &c., and, upon her Ladyship's decease, directs the real estate, over which he has a power of appointment, to his brother with the charge, to be divided between his younger son and two daughters in equal portions.

The will of John Adolphus Young, Esq., of Hare Hatch, Berkshire, late of Lincoln's-inn-fields, was proved in London by the executors, William Young, Esq., the son, Charles Edward Jones, Esq., the son-in-law, and Edward Jones, Esq., the brother. The personal property was sworn under £40,000. The testator was of the established firm of Young, Jennings, and Young, of Lincoln's-inn-fields, solicitors, and died at an advanced age, having executed his will in 1860, and a codicil in September last, bequeathing to his son, William Young, his interest in a mortgage settlement, a life interest in certain freeholds for herself and a daughter, and leaving to his wife, Mrs. Elizabeth Young, an annuity. All the residuary estate are devised to his son, Adolphus William Young, Esq., M.P. for Yarmouth, 1857-9, formerly Chief Justice of the Leeward Islands, and subsequently Chief Justice of the Legislative Council of that colony. The residue of his personal property, after the payment of his debts, is to be divided into four equal parts amongst his (the testator's) children and a son-in-law. There are legacies to servants.

The will of John Cattley, Esq., of Shabden Park, Chipstead, Surrey, and of Moorgate-street, and a bullion merchant, was proved in London on the 31st ult., by the executors, personalty under £600,000. The executors and trustees are the relict, together with John Garrett Cattley, Esq., the son, William Edward Cattley, Esq., the son, and Frederick Cattley, Esq., and an advanced age, having executed his will in 1860, and a codicil in September last, bequeathing to his wife, Mrs. Cattley, during her widowhood, a life interest in the furniture, as well as in the residue of his estate, real and personal. To children, by his first marriage, he bequeaths £5000 each, as part of his share, at a valuation, all or any part of the complimentary plate presented to the testator by the London Assurance Corporation. He also bequeaths a legacy of £5,000, and to each of his (the testator's) six daughters, £1,000, besides the share of the property, as they may become due which, equally amongst all his children. Legacies of £700 are bequeathed to his executors, and annuities and legacies to his servants.

France, Russia, and Turkey have signed a convention for the reconstruction of the organ of the church of the Holy Sepulchre.

The Great Eastern Railway Company is about to place ten additional passenger and thirty additional goods engines upon its system, at a cost of about £100,000. The proceedings of the Bread-fruit Society, announced as likely to take place, has been postponed till the winter has been passed.

The following cause recently came before the Breadalbane Peerage was lodged on Thursday week with the Sheriff Clerk of Chancery:—"Should a petition be presented by John Alexander Gavin Campbell, Esquire, of Glenfalloch, or by any other party, praying to be served nearest and lawful heir of line and provision, or in any other character, to the Most Noble the Marquis of Breadalbane, who died on or about the 9th day of November last, the sheriff-depute reserve to be heard on behalf of Charles William Campbell, Esq., of the 10th Regiment of Bengal Cavalry, eldest son of the now deceased Charles William Campbell, Esq., formerly residing at Boreland, and thereafter at No. 11, Howard-place, Edinburgh, as nearest lawful heir to the title and estates of Breadalbane."—HENRY BUCHAN, S.S.C., Edinburgh, Jan. 8, 1863.

CONCERT IN THE GREAT HALL, HAMPTON COURT PALACE, IN AID OF THE LANCASHIRE DISTRESS FUND.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

CONCERT IN THE GREAT HALL, HAMPTON COURT

PALACE, IN AID OF THE LANCASHIRE FUND.

WE last week gave a short notice of the morning concert given in aid of the distress in Lancashire and Cheshire, in the great hall of Hampton Court Palace, on the 2nd inst. We now engrave a View of the Hall as it appeared on that day. Her Majesty had graciously accorded her permission to the choristers of the Chapel Royal, Hampton Court, to attend, and the concert found the patronage of the Duke of Cambridge, the officers of the 18th Hussars, and various members of the aristocracy, &c. The performance, conducted by Dr. Bellr, went off very successfully, and to the satisfaction of the numerous audience, assembled chiefly from the surrounding neighbourhood. The effect of the gaily dressed concourse in the old Gothic hall, aided by a bright day, was very good. One would have thought this hall, with its elaborately-carved and pendanted roof, ill adapted for musical purposes, but this was hardly felt at the concert. Mdme Alberoni's voice seemed to lose none of its accustomed power, whilst the solos of Messrs. Wilbye Lazarus, on violin and clarinet, were as delightful as elsewhere; and there was a charm and novelty about the whole affair, which was very refreshing. It was decidedly a good idea. The various artistes gave their services gratuitously, and the sum realised was upwards of £140.

The Great Hall of Wolsey's Palace—often, though incorrectly, called the "Cardinal's Hall"—is among the finest of our ancient buildings. It was really not built when Wolsey gave up his palace to Henry VIII., and, though finally designed by him, was not commenced until several years afterwards. It stands on the site of an older hall, and was commenced in 1531. Some writers say that Wolsey was the date of the erection of this hall; but satisfactory evidence has been found in the accounts of works executed at Hampton Court Palace in the Public Record Office to show that the old hall was taken down and the new one commenced about the year stated above, and, as appears from the same evidence, the present hall was completed in 1535; and we may feel pretty certain that the main features of the room have remained unaltered to the present time, although Keen in his day did his best to injure it, and sundry modern decorations are not in the best taste.

The hall is so well known by the Londoners, and by many "country cousins" also, that few words of description are needed. Having ascended to the height of about twenty-four feet from the floor-way of the first court, we enter the hall beneath the minstrel gallery. It is 106ft. in length, 40ft. in width, and 60ft. in height. The high-pitched, richly-carved timber roof is particularly beautiful, with its elaborate pendants, spandrels, and corbels. It is abundantly lighted by windows on each side and at each end. The bold window in the south side, at the upper or dais end of the hall, is the bow window, with "richly-carved pendent fans." On the dais was constructed the temporary orchestra for the concert. At the opposite, or this end of the hall an arched doorway—the top of which appears in the Engraving—leads from the dais into the ante-room, or Presence Chamber or Withdrawing Room, in which, on this occasion, refreshments were provided for the performers, &c. The walls are hung with a group of St. George and the Dragon, and the knight in "real armour;" and on each side, on brackets, stands a figure in half armour. Antlers of stags heads are arranged at the back of the hall, and this with crossed weapons beneath. The stained glass is modern, having been well executed by Mr. Willement some years ago.

One of the most remarkable and interesting features in this hall are the tapestries or arras which hang beneath the windows. In all probability they belonged to the same suite that hung in Wolsey's Hall, though not originally in the Great Hall. They are in separate pieces; around each is an arabesque border, and the centre compartments of the subjects illustrate sacred incidents in the life of Abraham, and various allegories. Many of them are very excellent, designed with grace and boldness, while the execution is perfect. The high lights are worked in gold. They well repay careful inspection. Many of the designs are attributed to Bernard van Orley, a pupil of Raphael.

Some very curious and interesting particulars as to the building of this hall, &c., may be found in the extracts from the accounts in Felix Summerly's useful "Handbook of Hampton Court." The same authority says that the carpets and cushions were used for the first time on the occasion of the banquet given by Henry VIII. to the ambassadors of the Emperor Charles V., on the 31st of May, 1535, when the hall was crowded and the audience as enthusiastic as ever; and this was all the more remarkable as the concert did not present any peculiar feature of attraction in the shape of new pieces or new performers. The concert began with Hummel's celebrated "Military Septet" for flute, hautboy, horn, bassoon, clarinet, violoncello, and double-bass, most admirably executed by Messrs. Hall, Sainton, Pratten, Lazarus, Reed, Paque, and Howell. Though short in its musical pulse, this was its first performance at the Monday Popular Concerts, and it was received with the warmest expressions of delight. This was the great feature of the concert, and it was admirably played. Two pieces were Beethoven's sonata in A major, the second of the set dedicated to Hoffe, one of the best beautiful as well as the earliest of the great master's works, performed by Hallé in a manner which we have never heard surpassed; Mendelssohn's fine sonata in B flat for the piano and violoncello, played by Hallé and Piatti, and Beethoven's well-known and charming quartet in C minor, performed by Messrs. Sainton, Watson, Webb, and Piatti, the latter being encored at every audition. The vocal portion of the concert was less satisfactory. Much disappointment was caused by the absence of Mdme. Sainton-Dolby, who was prevented from appearing by sudden indisposition. Miss Banks was summoned at very short notice, and sang extremely well, but (as must happen in such cases) her selection was not the happiest. Dr. Arne's beautiful "How Pleasbue sinketh in the west," sung by Mr. Winn, was the most agreeable vocal performance of the evening.

Mr. HENRY LESLIE'S Choir gave their first concert of the season at the Hanover-square Rooms on the evening of the 14th inst. The programme was very interesting. It included the "Hymn Celeste" of Leonardo Leo, a pretty old choral fugue of the old Italian school; Haëtun's part-song, "The Maypole;" Benedict's part-song, "Ould Ley-days;" Mendelssohn's magnificent psalm for an eight-part choir, "Why rage the heathen?" and Mr. Leslie's part-song, "Evening." All these, and several other fine pieces of the same class, were admirably performed, principally under the direction of Mr. Goldwin, Miss Cox, Miss M. A. Walsh, Mdme. Clara West, Miss Barrow, Mr. Bodda, Mr. Matthews, Mr. W. Evans, Mr. G. Taylor, Mr. G. F. Marler, and Mr. Shirley Hodson: and the choir was of the very great strength, being 120 voices. Mendelssohn's solo on the pianoforte was played by Herr Willem Coenen, a young pianist of great merit. Altogether this concert was highly successful, and augurs well for the brilliant season for this excellent society.

The SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY gave their first performance of this season in Exeter Hall on the evening of the 16th inst. It consisted of Mendelssohn's music for the tragedy of "Antigone," and of Mozart's "Requiem." Next week we shall make a few remarks on this performance.

It is proposed to amalgamate the Charing-cross and South-Eastern Railways on such terms and conditions as the two companies may think fit, subject to the assent of two-thirds of the votes of the shareholders in each company; the agreement to take effect either before or after the completion of the works of the Charing-cross line.

The judgeship of the Marylebone, Brentford, and Brompton Coun y Court (Circuit No. 61), rendered vacant by the death of Mr. J. Adolphus, has been conferred on Sir John E. Eardley-Wilmot, Judge of the Bristol, Chipping, Sodbury, and Thornbury County Courts (Circuit No. 54). Mr. Willes, the Judge of the County Court of Northumberland (Circuit No. 1), will succeed Sir J. E. Eardley-Wilmot; and William Brandt, Esq., of the Northern Circuit, will succeed Mr. Willes in Northumberland.

COLUMN FOR THE CURIOUS.

THE SCORESBY MEMORIAL CHAIR.

IF ever man deserved to be ranked as a "martyr to science," the late Dr. Scoresby undoubtedly deserves to be considered as entitled to such distinction. His long life was devoted to the interests of his science; when ten years old he accompanied his father to sea, as the distinguished North Polar navigator. This early passion for nautical life grew with young Scoresby's growth, and father and son continued to sail together on the same eight years, the latter keeping a journal of their voyages; and at the age of sixteen he was appointed chief mate of the ship. The winter intervals of his whaling voyages the young navigator devoted to scientific study bearing upon his peculiar profession. To this knowledge he subsequently added his own observation and experience in the voyages of the Arctic regions; and, before he was of age, he and his father navigated the highest northern latitudes attained in ordinary sailing. Having made seventeen voyages to the Spitsbergen or Greenland whale-fishery, young Scoresby, now captain, published their results, the first original work of its kind. This led to a series of whaling-fishery to ascertain the enterprise in geographical discovery, which had not before been united with the pursuit of whalers. After his retirement from the whale-fishery, Mr. Scoresby's early religious impressions led him to enter the University of Cambridge, where he took his degree of B.D.

At the close of the year 1822 Mr. Scoresby directed his attention, practical magnetism and its relation to navigation were most actively pursued by him through his life; and, at an iron foundry established at shipbuilding, he specially applied himself to consider the influence of the iron of ships upon their compasses, and the requisite correction of the indications of the latter; and he subsequently published various papers of these important investigations. In 1855 he communicated to the British Association a summary of his magnetic researches and the evidence in their favour, in which he recalled attention to his plan of a compass-adjuster, as affording a simple and effective mode of ascertaining the direction of a ship's course; and to exemplify this, and to determine other questions in magnetic science, Dr. Scoresby undertook, in 1856, a voyage to Australia in the screw-steamer, iron steam-ship. Everything corresponded with theory; but he never recovered from the exhausting efforts of this great scientific labour for a frame approaching seventy years of age. Upon one occasion, when a violent cyclone was raging, he ascended the mizen rigging to place his self-acting log in operation, and was thrown to the lee 30ft. He returned to England in shattered health, and gave a most interesting account of his voyage to a large audience at Whitby; but, while preparing the results of his labours for publication, he died in May, 1857, and was buried at Torquay, where a tablet has been erected by his widow to his memory.

The emigrant, merchant, shipowner, and underwriter all owe much to the well-directed energies of Dr. Scoresby; and, as a memorial of his eminent services, the leading members of the mercantile bodies of Liverpool, who were more immediately benefited by his labours, have recently, by subscription, presented to his widow a handsome chair, made of timber taken from the Royal Charter, the initials of which appear on each side of the compass, which crowns the whole. Beneath is the inscription-plate, made from a copper bolt from the above vessel: it is supported by anchors, the hempen cables of which are twined over the top of the chair. Underneath is a carved representation of the wreck of the steamer, and the line "Thou, Lord, rulest the raging of the sea." Below the seat of the chair is the Scoresby's crest and motto. The following is the inscription upon the back:—

This chair, made from a timber of the Royal Charter, in which iron steamship the Rev. William Scoresby, D.D., F.R.S., at the age of sixty-six, underwent his last labours in the service of humanity in the year of our Lord, 1856, is presented to Mrs. Scoresby, by the owners of the vessel and other friends associated with the deceased philanthropist and navigator, as a token of their best, in grateful remembrance of the services rendered to navigation by her husband through a long life of unwearied devotion to science.

The chair has been presented to Mrs. Scoresby, with an appropriate address, signed by Mr. T. Brocklebank, chairman of the Liverpool Dock Committee; Mr. C. Lamport, chairman of the Underwriters' Association; and Mr. W. H. Jones, chairman of the Wrecked Property Association.

Mrs. Scoresby, in acknowledging this handsome memorial, refers to her loved husband's exertions in these touching words:—

In earnest pursuit of the enquiries in which he was a subject which for some time had occupied my late lamented husband's attention, and it was for this reason he undertook the voyage to Australia in the screw-steamer in which had the privileges of accompanying him.

It is very gratifying to me to find in your address how candidly you have acknowledged the services which my late husband rendered to the commerce of Liverpool; and, as I was a supporter in his voyages in any way lessened his death, I can only say his valuable life was shortened that he might, by the sacrifice, be of more extensive benefit to the world at large.

As emanating from the town with which Dr. Scoresby had been so long closely connected and which has most largely benefited by his benevolent exertions, this present is a proper tribute to a most scientific navigator and his amiable widow.

The chair is a good specimen of ornamental cabinet-work by Messrs. W. Hayes and Son, of Liverpool. The accompanying illustration is from a photograph by Mr. W. Keith.

THE THEATRES.

LYCEUM.—After a long suspense Mr. Fechter's experiment has at last made its first appeal to the public at this theatre. His first care was to provide it with a good and convenient house, and one that should look clean and neat. He has accordingly had its interior renovated, though not re-embellished, the ground-work remaining undivided by Mr. Charles Mathews being well adapted for its purpose and yet in good condition. The ceiling has been newly painted in panels, and the names of our great dramatic poets inscribed in its different compartments. The old and advice, too, of Messrs. Defries and Sons have been called in, and they have replaced the old chandeliers from before the boxes, thus obviating the heat and smoke that were so annoying. The auditorium is now lighted by their patent sunlights, arranged so as to resemble a glass chandelier; and it is also well ventilated by means recommended by the same distinguished firm, and which are more effectual than any that have been employed. The new arrangements of the house are, so far, satisfactory. Other improvements have been introduced, such as doubling the lobby between the entrances and the officials who take care of articles of dress, umbrellas, &c.

The theatre was opened on Saturday, and attended by a numerous and fashionable audience. The drama provided was a new piece for the occasion—one by M. Paul Féval, adapted by Mr. John Brougham. An honourable arrangement has been made with the French author, in pursuance of the international Act, so that no arbitrary alterations have been made to disguise, at the risk of impairing, the integrity of the piece. Mr. Brougham has, however, transferred some of the characters into an Irishman, named Carrickfergus, which he acts himself. He has also added to the last scene a strange piece of extravagacious colouring to the manners and to the opening and serves to vary the tone during the progress of the action. The new drama is entitled, "The Duke's Motto." It consists of a prologue and three acts, the first of the three being very long, and, we think, originally two. The Duke indicated by the title is Don Juan de Nevers (Mr. F. Charles), who, being threatened with assassination by the Prince de Gonzagues (Mr. G. Vining) for the hand of his ward, visits his wife in secret for the purpose of receiving his infant daughter through the window of the château, that she may be placed in safety out of the reach of the villanous Prince. The child is carried into the care and custody of Henri de Lagardère (Mr. Fechter), a gallant captain who has a duel on his hands with the Prince; but' detention in the Bastile claims of the free dancers who have the Prince's commission. He locks up the braves in the room of an inn on the Spanish frontiers, and proceeds himself to the Prince, after receiving the infant, to treat with Nevers; but, instead of fighting him, proposes to defend him against the accusal alleged, and to take charge of his child in order to ease the father should fall. He does fall, being shot by the infamous Prince himself; but Lagardère manages to escape, vowing to avenge the death of his friend by the protection of his daughter.

Twenty years elapse between the close of the prelude and the first act of the drama. The scene opens with a rugged and mountainous gorge, wherein are assembled some Zingari, who, with Zillah, their Queen (Miss O. Leclercq), dance a ballet, composed by M. Petit. Here Lagardère (Mr. Fechter), who had his party, meets with Hector Peyrolles (Mr. Widdicomb), a cowardly fellow, with a reputation for bravery. Peyrolles, discovering Lagardère, has him arrested and one Æsop, a hunchback (Mr. Raymond). Lagardère, with Blanche, his ward, are also present, and learn that Gonzagues has married Nevers's widow in contempt of the edict of the latter, and the discovery of the fact whether the heiress be dead or alive. Gonzagues resolves to make sure that she is dead, and he finds to be a child and a foundling, as Nevers's daughter. Lagardère counteracts this plan by slaying Æsop and immediately assuming his garb and character. The scene changes, and a family council is held in the oratory of the Princes de Gonzagues, who still reverses the memory of Nevers, and is surrounded by the portraits of her and her chamber. The Regent Orleans (Mr. M'Intyre) presides, while the Prince announces that he is prepared to produce the long-lost Blanche; but Lagardère, as Æsop returning from the portrait, tells her of the intended fraud. She therefore refuses to receive Zillah as her daughter, and the Regent declares that Blanche shall appear at court, and undertaking to produce her at the Regent's ball. It is the intention of Lagardère to denounce at the ball the iniquitous Prince as the murderer of his cousin, and to this end he has procured the shall appear with the documents of her identity in her possession; but he is defeated in both by the machinations of Hector Peyrolles, who steals her abduction, and thus secured both her and the papers in question. Of this subject he is defeated by Lagardère underground by means of a signal, that of dropping his glove—and poor Lagardère is paralysed, and declines to proceed further in the business. Gonzagues then assumes the demands, and denouncing him as the murderer of Nevers, secures his incarceration, intending to have him assassinated in prison. With this conclusion, indeed, the fourth act opens. Peyrolles is employed to execute the sentence, but, of course, is incompetent to the task, and the attempt only affords to the captain the means of effecting his liberation, and he is discover Blanche's whereabouts, again disguising himself as Æsop, he visits the Prince, whom he finds carousing with his companions in the gardens and conservatory in the Rue St. Magloire, and learns from him that Blanche is in the palace. Pretending to fall in with his plans, he accompanies the Prince to the house, in which he finds the wandering marriage instead of being murdered, and offers himself as the wilting husband. The Prince, in his confusion assents to the proposal as a jest, and send for Blanche. The poor girl pleads for pity in vain; but when she recognises her protector in the hunchback she readily falls in with all his suggestions. He tells her that he is about to make magical influence, under which she accepts him as her husband. A burial-service is performed, and signed and sealed, Lagardère affixes his signature and declares himself. The entrance of the Regent prevents the contest, and Lagardère now professes himself to be a servant of the Prince, in which he is recommended at the ball. He points to Blanche as the daughter of Nevers, and allows to the astonishment of the Regent in which he and the dying Duke had written the name of his murderer. The agitation of the Prince reveals his guilt, and he seeks to destroy the paper by burning it. Lagardère prevents him, exclaiming, "There is no escape, sir, but you have written your own name in it." He next defies him to mortal combat, and the curtain falls during the mutual struggle. The work of justice having been thus perfected, Blanche throws herself into her preserver's arms, and the curtain falls to great applause.

In these details the reader will perceive substance of a drama that is full of action and incident. The audience are whirled through a crowd of particulars that are permitted to think of nothing but the coming solution. The character of the gallant hero interests them by his bravery and devotion, and Mr. Fechter plays it with the utmost skill and effect. The changes of character which Lagardère to Lagardère are most adroitly executed, so as to deceive the audience as well as the Prince. The fencing and other actions is capital, severe, and sustained by the actor with the utmost spirit. All, too, is marked with that artistic finish which conceals the art ordinarily employed, and presents the scene in the natural development; but we must remember that it is a melodrama which we are describing, and that no sustained attention is required to the words of the piece, which are passionate appeals. Acting in such plays is a very simple process, and mainly consists in carrying out the stage directions. Mr. Fechter, indeed, brings life to the skeleton and invests it with a personality; while those that surround him are comparatively the mere puppets of the scene, and move only as the string is pulled. Miss Heath, by Messrs. Gates and Cuthbert, is admirably painted, and highly conducive to the general effect.

The drama was preceded by a slight sketch, entitled "A Sudden Attack," in which Mr. Shore, as a Captain of the Guards, forces his attentions on a lady of title who has taken refuge in Mdme. Celeste's lodging-house. As an introduction to the evening's entertainment it served by its pith, or rather a lively manner, a provisional half-hour, and was allowed to pass without encore. A new curtain painted for the stage commanded the admiration of all from the taste displayed in its arrangement, and the National Anthem, which was sung at the conclusion of the performance, brought the entire company on to the stage, and kept the audience in the theatre to a late hour.

NEW ADELPHI.—On Monday Miss Marie Wilton made her début at this theatre in "The Little Treasure." She is engaged for a limited number of nights, and was, as might have been expected from her previous popularity, favourably received.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

ABOUT that guardian of the public purse whom we know by the name of the Chancellor of the Exchequer there hangs a tradition that he is a moody, dreamy individual, on whose brow care sits brooding, and who is everlastingly engaged in recondite arithmetical calculations, in which he is endeavouring to reconcile an anomalous juxtaposition of farthings with millions. He may be imagined to be a hapless being whose nights are sleepless and whose waking thoughts are divided between the unpaid-for land-drain of financial critics, who assail him with ruthless intentions the presentation of his annual balance-sheet. Bowed with a premature old age, he sits with a quenchless thirst of gold, and personifying the fabulous avaricious man who is always wanting more, he may be supposed to be a victim under the slow torture of ineffectual efforts to get money, with neither time nor thought to spare upon any other object. Nor does this idea apply only to the Minister of Finance for the time being, but to the whole list of his predecessors, but with equal force it is applicable to one who has resources in plenty, and who, from the strenuous decency of his character and refreshing rain. When he is pursued by all the difficulties range highest, for he has to answer satisfactorily that most perplexing of questions—what will he do with it? During the Parliamentary recess, now fast drawing to a close, Mr. Gladstone, so far from playing the part of a voracious calculator, who can read wonders about as heartily as that of Mr. Babbage at the disturbing music of a street band, and who seeks solitude and quiet for predestinating his cunning Budget, has seemed to have adopted the character of travelling representative of the Cabinet. Not a week has passed but the newspapers have produced columns headed "The Chancellor of the Exchequer on" something—Metaphysics, finance, diplomacy, social statistics—everything by turns; and at last, rather than that eloquent tongue should cease to sound on the pleased ears of rapt audiences, he absolutely takes up something like the task of Scheherazade, and tells interminable stories in a local manner. There, in short, the phrase and manner tossed down to the semi-mystic comprehension, he tells how once upon a time, he travelled in Sicily, and how there was a good people behind as a sort of mild magic, akin to that credulity which connects the death of wealthy cattle with the muttered curses of a neighbouring old woman. Liberty having been restored after the oppression of the land, ignorance, and superstition, and credulity have been swept away, and the Sicilians become so judicious, and so decided in knowing, that they detect even their idol Garibaldi when he makes a mistake, and will not be induced to follow him when he only shines like a will-o'-the-wisp. Then, after the reverse to the cause, the false cut all sorts of obstacles, increase on the year by two millions, and when the Chancellor of the Exchequer has got over this portion of his limited brow, and sits pleasantly telling pretty stories to his country neighbours!

There has been an immense eruption of Members of Parliament all over the country in the last week, but they have been evoked by the call of remunerative duty, and have been about as much like exciting what, in a certain sense, is their own work, in the shape of Highway Acts, and so on, as the moon is like a cheese-toasted by a candle. Each has his characteristics which inspire the notes which appear in this column have been prominent, but there are gleanings here and there which, if not lively, are at least of a character to show that really characteristic outbursts on the part of Colonel North, who, scarcely overlooking the Conservatories of Oxfordshire, and the hothouses of Staffordshire, and orchard-houses of Herefordshire, has been content to be the champion—self-elected, of course—of the Army in the House of Commons. Of course, the Colonel is about as good an impersonation of the gallant gentleman's tongue-errantry on its behalf as was Dulcinea del Toboso of the romantic imaginations of Don Quixote de la Mancha. It is almost, if not wholly, unconscious of the devotion it inspires; and, if it were conscious, would probably be more amused than sympathising. Take the case of Lieutenant-Colonel Loftus Tottenham, who has been a pupil at Sandhurst, who entered the Army in 1852 (this is all the record which can be found of his history), who is a Lieutenant-Colonel of the Tower Hamlets Militia, and who, in these days of free locks and lithpian cravats, holds to the stock of the period when George IV. was king. He has a right to it, and he has a right to say what he always speaks in the name of the Army. And who are the more uninitiated among the people to gainsay him? Certainly not those ignorammuses may be permitted to agree with him in the indignant remontrance which we offered the other day to the sticking of guns aspirated from the Crimea on pedestals in the streets of provincial places, where they are anything but ornamental, and as trophies are as bad take enough. Our remonstrance hit always upon the question of the indignant Russians, who suddenly come upon the spoils torn from them, stacking their muzzles up in the High-street of Kettle-Pottington, and wishing to melt the cannons into the metal, which might so easily have been utilised in the pot and pan way instead of being converted into a ugly ornamentation of a street. Then, the sentiments of the whole Army, having been enunciated by Colonel North at the Oxfordshire Quarter Sessions, were indorsed in a few grimly caustic sentences by Mr. Henley; and another gun—which Lord Panmure presented to the country, probably because no "Down's" could make such a present, have been doomed to a life of cold obstruction and to rot, unless some benevolent marine-store dealer takes them to the hospitable fires.

He that has not seen Lord Palmerston at Romsey, when his foot is on his native sward, has not seen one of the brightest sides of that social Saleidoscope, always ready to present more facets to the eye of the looking, if one may say so; and, if ever the words "friends and neighbours" had a real, unaffected, and hearty ring of confidence written them in the gatherings of the inhabitants of the quaint little town which stands at the gates of his demesne. On the principle implied in the phrase, "a man is not a prophet in his own land," the Mayor of Romsey must believe that he has considerable influence in the Government of the country. Nor is there any reason to suppose that the friend of the Prime Minister cannot but be an occult influence on public affairs. But, speaking with all seriousness, there is something very pleasant in the free and genial intercourse between Lord Palmerston and those amongst whom he lives: and a day is well spent which is passed in witnessing the honest heartiness of welcome of the citizens in the flowing together of neighbours there is always drawn into the circle a gentleman who, as a representative member for Hampshire, ought not to be a mere first aide-de-camp to Lord Palmerston; but the Hon. Ralph Dutton, to whom we allude, has fallen wholly into the spirit of the place, and is as much

"THE HOLY FAMILY," GOBELINS TAPESTRY, AFTER RAPHAEL, PRESENTED TO THE SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM BY THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON III.—SEE PRECEDING PAGE.

THE LOAN COLLECTION.

WE this week submit to our readers a second series of Engravings from some of the most remarkable objects in the Loan Collection of the South Kensington Museum. We have already given a general description of this really magnificent and unparalleled collection (June 21, 1862), and also (on the 10th ult.) a number of illustrations.

One of the most remarkable and memorable features of the Loan Collection is due to the fact that to it were contributed all the specimens of Henri Deux faience known in this country. There are only fifty-four pieces of this ware in Europe: twenty-nine are in France, one in Russia, and the remainder have been exhibited in one of the cases at South Kensington. So rare are they that these pieces are valued at an average of £1000 each; consequently, this case is worth some £25,000! A large proportion are contributed by Sir Anthony and other members of the Rothschild family. This pottery, known in France as "Faience de Henri Deux," or of his mistress, "Diane de Poictiers," is a perfectly original and unique variety of earthenware, produced somewhere in France during the later years of the reign of Francis I., and the reign of Henri Deux, by, in all probability, one single potter, or, at all events, invented by him; and imitated by only one assistant or descendant instructed in his methods. Yet, despite the researches of the last twenty or thirty years, its inventor and the place of its production are shrouded in mystery. All that is known is the ownership of some of the pieces, evidenced by armorial bearings and initials. Its rarity may be a sufficient recommendation to mere collectors, but its intrinsic merits give it an interest to all. It is quaintly pleasing, and in some respects beautiful as well as original; its designs are marked by ornate and elaborate ornamentation, yet the general effect is extremely chaste. It is also strikingly typical of the French Renaissance, so much so, indeed, as to preclude the possibility of its having been produced, as was some time supposed, by Girolamo, of the famous family of potters della Robbia, who settled in France during the first half of the sixteenth century. Whilst displaying great variety of form and decorative detail the pieces are all conceived in the same characteristic general style which, though strongly and unmistakably national, is also in the highest degree both personal and local. There can, in fact, be little doubt that, as in the case of the Palissy ware, this famous pottery was the work or invention of one individual artist, whose labours were evidently anterior to those of that very remarkable "artiste en terre." The ware[is, as the writer in the catalogue justly remarks, "scarcely less remarkable from a technical point of view. Its fabrication displays novelties of a singularly interesting nature. Every circumstance denotes that the producer was an original genius, one of those representative men who arise only at rare intervals in the province of art, as, indeed, in any other sphere." The rarity of the Henri Deux ware is not remarkable. On the contrary, it is surprising that so many of these fragile pots, in the hands of a man, should have escaped the chances and changes of three centuries. Something also of an historical or romantic, as well as an artistic or technical, interest attaches to this faience from the consideration that, like the Sèvres porcelain of the age of Louis XV. and Louis XVI., it was apparently the potterie de luxe of the brilliant Courts of Francis I. and Henri Deux, as evidenced by the ciphers, armorial bearings, &c., which occur on so many specimens—the same Courts which gave so much encouragement also to the Limgusin enamellers. "To all appearance, the art died with its author, or was continued only for a brief period after his time, the inherent difficulties attending the production of the ware being probably too great to allow of any remunerative result to the mere industrialists of the day, even had they been capable of continuing the complex and difficult processes of the master." We may mention that a great number of pieces came originally from Touraine, the stronghold of the French Renaissance, and notably from Thouars. Two principal processes have been followed in this pottery; first, "the modelling of portions in relief, which were made separately, generally in moulds, afterwards carefully modelled up by hand, and finally stuck on or appliqué to the body of the piece before it was fired;" and, secondly, the flat ornamentation, consisting of interlaced scrollwork, roettes, initial letters, &c. In this last consisted the greatest novelty, as the appliqué process had been used in the Italian wares. There are no duplicate pieces of this pottery. Although the ewers, candlesticks, tazze, saltcellars, &c., have a sufficiently close general resemblance to each other, they all vary widely in their outward forms and details; each specimen, indeed, appears to have been virtually unique of its kind. We will now describe the three very representative specimens we have chosen for engraving, borrowing the details from the official catalogue.

The large "ewer or aiguière" is a most celebrated and exquisitely-beautiful piece of Henri Deux ware, and unquestionably in every respect the finest and most important specimen now extant. The body of the piece is oviform; all the plane surfaces are covered with incrusted interlaced ornament of several different designs; the pattern on the lower part of the body contains the letter "G," repeated in the centre of numerous small compartments, formed by the interlaced diaper; on the widest or most salient part of the body four beautifully-modelled Medusa masks, in high relief, are attached or applied. The foot or base forms a series of elaborate mouldings, further enriched by applied strapwork scrolls in relief, pecten shells, cherubs' heads, &c. The neck of the ewer, likewise richly diapered with incrusted ornamentation, is divided into two portions by a bead or torus moulding in the centre, the portions above and below this moulding respectively being campaniform, each of the bells being turned in opposite directions. The spout or mouth of the vase is shaped as a large pecten shell, underneath which, in front, another grotesque female mask is attached to the neck of the vase; the handle is formed by a syren with her head downwards, and fore quarters resting on the body of the vase, whilst the extremities are formed by two serpents, which form the elegantly-curved grip of the handle; the involuted extremities, where they join on to the large pecten shell at the mouth of the piece, terminate in two serpents' heads modelled with great spirit. This celebrated piece was purchased at the sale of M. Odiot, a silversmith and well-known collector, of Paris, about the year 1845, and is beautifully engraved in Shaw's "Decorative Arts of the Middle Ages." The price paid for this piece at the Odiot sale was 2000*l.*, or 2,400*l.* in all probability it would now realise at least £2000 sterling. It is described and photographed in

GROUP OF HENRI II. WARE.

Mr. J. C. Robinson's "Notice of the Magniac Collection." The design is entirely unique, and the piece is also the largest known specimen of the ware, its extreme height to the top of the handle being 14½in., and the greatest diameter of the oviform body 9in. It may be observed that the letter "G" in the diaper on the body of the piece, which has been adduced by M. Delange as indicating the artist's name, "Giroliamo" (Della Robbia), is, with more likelihood, the initial of the original proprietor of the ewer, or personage for whom it was expressly executed; no armorial bearings or other insignia are borne upon it. This piece belongs to Hollingworth Magniac, Esq., and although it has just been returned to the owner, we could not omit noticing it.

The "Bibron" or water-pot is also a most beautiful piece, and certainly one of the finest specimens of Henry Deux ware extant. Its general shape is oviform or pear-shaped, but spherical at its widest portion being uppermost. More correctly speaking, the body is divided into two portions, the lower and smaller one supported on a moulded foot, being in shape like a small campaniform vase or bell, crowned with an elegant group of mouldings; on this rests the larger half of the body, which forms a somewhat flattened sphere, round the centre of which is a projecting torus or twisted cable moulding; a short moulded neck surmounts this, and the mouth is closed in with a flat cover, forming two semicircular valves, hinged on a central transverse bar or pin. A short tubular spout, richly moulded, projects at an oblique angle from the upper portion; underneath, or at the base of which, is a mask in relief, surrounded with foliage or caulicolous ornament. A curved bracket or suspension handle, in three divisions, of most elegant design, spans the piece. The inlaid ornamentation, with which the surface of the vase is entirely covered, consists of the richest interlaced band or scrollwork, rosettes, strings of guilloche ornament, &c.; in brilliant reddish colour; a curved band or fascia, on the neck or shoulder of the piece, has a row of ciphers, being the letters A M, elegantly arranged as a decorative monogram. Although there are no armorial bearings there can be little doubt that the monogram is that of the Constable Anne de Montmorency. Extreme height to top of handle, 9¾in.; diameter at widest part, 5¾in. It is the property of Andrew Fountaine, Esq.

Round-shaped "hanap," with spout and handle, is another very remarkable specimen of Henri Deux ware. Considered on the whole, this is perhaps the most beautiful of all the minor pieces; its period appears to be that of the large "Magniac" ewer. The shape is characteristic of French Renaissance: hanaps in brass and silver of this same type hang very commonly just with us. Its general form is that of an inverted cone, supported on a low moulded foot; the handle is formed by a boldly-modelled figure of a satyr in full relief, his outstretched arms clasping the circumference of the lip or margin, his feet resting on a projecting mask. The spout on the opposite side is a large figure of a lizard, also in full relief, with a gaping mouth, through which the fluid was poured; on the breast of this animal is attached a lozenge-shaped escutcheon, with the arms and numerous fleurs and charges of armorial ornamentation, the latter in dark brown inlay. The lizard spout is glazed with green enamel. Engraved in the "Manchester Art Treasures," pl. 9. Height, 7¼in. This hanap is in the collection of Sir Anthony de Rothschild, Bart.

The "Murat Swordhilt" was, as its name implies, made for Murat, King of Naples. The handle is formed of the largest-known aqua marine set in iron; the jacinth mount is mounted in coloured gold-leaf ornaments, and there is a collar of turquoises and jacinths at each end; the gold cross-piece is set with three diamond terminating in lions' heads. It belongs to Mr. Beresford Hope's collection.

The two groups of Venetian and other glass might well tempt us far in describing the very interesting manufacture in ancient and modern times. We must, however, limit ourselves to the famous Venetian productions.

Venice, from a very early period, carried on a profitable traffic in beads, a trade in which it may have succeeded the Phœnicians. The arts declined when the great Republic with Asia Minor possibly lost its obtaining a knowledge of the art, or, more probably, it obtained when the great Constantinople at the beginning of the thirteenth century, consequent upon the declining Byzantine dominion. Workshops were certainly in full activity from this period till the year 1291, when they were all transferred to the neighbouring island of Murano. During the fourteenth century the principal manufacture consisted of beads, imitation jewels, &c., which found a ready market in Asia and Africa. In the fifteenth century the manufacture of glass vessels became of importance. A new direction was given to the manufacture arising from the capture of Constantinople by the Turks and the revival of ancient art in Italy. The former event threw the glass trade almost entirely into the hands of the Venetians, and the latter gave them new and more excellent principles of design. It was not, however, till the early part of the sixteenth century that the first of the very beautiful processes for which we now chiefly prize the Venetian glass was discovered. The earlier specimens are generally gilt and enamelled. Not far in the sixteenth century the frosted and millefiori glass was introduced; and later, the schmelz and "lace," or vitro di trina and latticeino glass. The discoveries were at first religiously kept secret by the manufacturers themselves; and against their divulgence the Venetian Government passed most stringent orders, and threatened the severest penalties. These manufacturers who remained faithful to the interest of the State in this lucrative trade—who remained silent, and were content to work at Murano—were ennobled citizens of Venice, and eligible for the highest official positions. In fact, each signal honour was paid to them that masters of the art were regarded as little inferior in dignity to the greatest nobles, and the highest privileges were extended to them. During the whole of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries Venice was the principal glass manufactory of all Europe, and it supplied every conceivable variety for ornament and use. Early in the eighteenth century, however, the Bohemian manufactures became fashionable, and from that time the art gradually declined at Murano, and it is now almost extinguished.

The principal varieties of Venetian glass are—1st. Objects in white or stained glass, ornamented in enamel colours and gilding. 2nd. Cracked, or frosted glass, sometimes with masks, flowers, &c., blown in relief on it from within. This kind is supposed to have been made by suddenly cooling the glass while blowing it, so as to crack the surface, then beating it again carefully, and blowing it a little more so as to widen the cracks open, and, finally, arresting it in any other glass. This kind of glass has been successfully imitated in modern times. 3rd. Glass ornamented with latticeino, or small milk-white or otherwise coloured threads (vein a ritorti), which, in beautiful spiral forms, are fused in rods of glass and blown. 4th. Pieces, in which two of these sets of spiral threads, going different ways, are conjoined so as to form a network, or "latticino" (either of white or other coloured threads), between each mesh of which a little air-bubble is formed. This kind, known also as "vitro di trina," or "vasi a reticelli," has called all efforts at successful imitation. 5th. Mosaic glass, in which slices of coloured glass rods were placed within two layers of white glass, and fused into masses ready to form vases, &c. This, termed "millefiori," or "vitro fiorito," has been very successfully revived in the present century. 6th. Glass in which very small particles of gold are arranged in patterns and fused, or in which metallic filings are dropped in the process of fusing, so as to form patches or blotches of gold, &c., termed "aventurine." 7th. Dark mottled glass of many colours, fused and blended, which, when held to the light, shows a deep ruby colour. To this species the German word "schmelitz" has been applied. A combination of this with the gold specs of the aventurine is called "Schmalz aventurine."

THE BATTLE-FIELD OF FREDERICKSBURG.

THE BATTLE OF FREDERICKSBURG.

To the account of this great battle, from a Federal point of view, already given in this Journal, we add a description of it from a Confederate standpoint. The Southern correspondent of the Times sends from General Lee's head-quarters the following particulars of the Battle of Fredericksburg:—

The morning of the 11th of December—a memorable day to the historian of the Decline and Fall of the American Republic—broke still and warm, while, as on the preceding day, a thick haze enveloped the town of Fredericksburg and the circumjacent valley, and delayed the uprising of fire by the antagonistic batteries until the sun had been up some three or four hours. It was strange to contrast—during the 13th of September, with Saturday the 6th, and to compare the intense cool of the earlier Saturday with the spring-like warmth and calmness of the latter. The day which I am describing was one of those outbursts of that Indian summer which lingers long and fondly in beautiful Virginia; its morning hour which shrouded heath, and grass, and forest trees was the ordinary prelude to the warmth and glow of the sun at noonday. As the fog lifted about ten in the morning, and the sun burst through the veil, then the long lines of the Federal army, which had passed the whole preceding day in deploying and preparing for the attack, were distinctly visible in the plain, and gave awful indications of the amount of the Federal destruction had crossed the river. The Confederate army, widely sundered by the strategical stories about the strength of their foe, waited calmly, drawn up for the most part within the fringe of the woods, confident in their position and in the valour which has never failed them. And here it may be as well finally to dispel those illusive under which it is the custom of the Northern press to call the ingress of defeat, when the fact itself admits of no denial. The whole number of Confederates in the field this day did not exceed from 81,000 to 82,000 men. Of these, some 25,000 men, taking the very highest estimate, took part in the fight.

It is impossible for me to describe the positions of each of the numerous Confederate batteries which stretched along the length of their six-mile lines of battle. It will suffice if I indicate the batteries which were most busily engaged, and bore the brunt of the action. By far the most important position was occupied by the Washington Artillery, commanded by Colonel Walker, of New Orleans, and posted on Lee's hights in the immediate rear of the town of Fredericksburg, not more than 400 yards from the town. These hights, which are precisely of that altitude which is most favourable for the play of artillery, are surmounted by a brick house, now riddled by round-shot, belonging to Mr. Marye, and are commonly called Marye's Heights. At their base a road winds, protected from one side by the hills and on the other by a solid stone wall, about four feet in height, over which a brigade of Confederates, themselves perfectly sheltered, poured the deadliest and most effective of fires. A little further back, to the south-east of Marye's Heights, stands another and higher hill, from which the most commanding view of the entire field is obtainable, and which, as it is the usual station of the Commander-in-Chief, is now known as General Lee's hill. From this hill during a large portion of Saturday a 30-pounder Parrott gun, cast at the Treadgar Works, in Richmond, poured a destructive fire into the Federals. Suddenly, about three in the afternoon, on its thirty-seventh discharge, this gun burst with a tremendous explosion, but happily did no injury to any of its attendants. At the moments of its explosion Captain Brooke, of the Grenadier Guards (favourably remembered for his behaviour under fire), Major Venable, of General Lee's staff, and Major Hamilton were standing within a few feet of the gun. Their escape without injury was little less than miraculous. As the Confederate line trends away from the hights, the left, under General Hood's division, were actively engaged against the advancing columns of Pennsylvanians; but, next to the batteries on Marye's hights, General Lee's hill, I should say, was the artillery commanded by Colonel Walker took the most effective part in the action, as it guarded a flanking fire which the enemy's left bore other battery deserves favourable mention, which is stationed in the spurs and mossy copses of the hill-side, and commands from the left of General Lee. On the extreme right of the Confederate line, in front of the centre, is posted General Stuart's cavalry, a few batteries of Stuart's Horse Artillery were thrown forward, to flank the Federals, directly on the opposite bank of the river. General Stuart's cousin, Major John Pelham, his Chief of Artillery, to advance one gun considerably towards the river, and to open upon them. Major Pelham obeyed, and opened the fire of a 12-pounder Napoleon gun with great precision and deadly effect into the Federal flank. The galling discharges of this gun quickly drew upon it the fire of three Federal field batteries, while, from across the river, two other heavy batteries joined in the cannonade. General Stuart's cousin and his gun were the target. For hours not less than thirty Federal cannon strove to silence Major Pelham's pop-gun, and strove in vain. The unyielding and unintermissive courage of Major Pelham, his couperove under the deadliest fire, have not made him unconscious, but more than noble pride from the respect of more glowing eulogy than upon this occasion. General Lee exclaimed, "It is surprising how young officers seem to me as they grow older" (Major Pelham is not more than twenty-two); General Jackson remarked, "With a Pelham upon either flank I could vanquish the world."

At half-past eight a.m. General Lee, accompanied by his full Staff, rode slowly along the front of the Confederate line from left to right, and took up his station for a time beyond Hamilton's Crossing, and in rear of the batteries on the extreme Confederate right. It would be presumptuous in me to say one word in commendation of the serenity, or, if I may so express it, the unconscious dignity of General Lee's courage when he is under fire. No one who sees and knowingly denounces in ordinary life would expect anything else from one so calm, so undemonstrative, and unassuming. But the description applied after the battle of Aboa to Lord Raglan by Marshal St. Arnaud, and in which, noticing Lord Raglan's unconsciousness under fire, he speaks of his "antique bearing," seems to me so applicable to General Lee that I cannot forbear recalling it here. At a subsequent period of the day General Lee resumed his station on the hill which takes its name from him, and thence, in company with General Longstreet, calmly watched the repulse of the repeated Federal efforts against the heights on which he stood. Occasionally General Jackson rode up to the spot and mingled in conversation with the other two leading Generals. Once General Longstreet exclaimed to him, "Are you not scared by that fire of Yankees you have before you down there?" to which General Jackson replied, "Wait till they come a little nearer, and they shall suffer more one of us will name them."

The battle opened when the sun had let in enough light through the mist to disclose the near proximity of the Federal lines and field batteries. The first shot was fired shortly before ten a.m. from the batteries in the Federal centre, and was directed against General Hood's division. The Pennsylvanian batteries were boldly under a heavy fire against the Confederates, who occupied one of the copse-wood spurs, and for a time permitted to hold it, when the concentrated Federal batteries opened on them, and a determined push was made by the Federal infantry in front of the woods to a section from charge of the Texans drove the Yankees out of the copse with a yell from which nothing could subsequently rally them. Simultaneously a heavy fire was poured from the batteries of General A. P. Hill's and General Ewell's divisions, which was vigorously replied to by the Federal field batteries. The only advantage apparently gained by the Federals in this quarter, and which is recorded in General Lee's report, was on the occasion of the collapse of a regiment of North Carolina conscripts, who broke and ran, but whose panic was rapidly taken by more intrepid successors. The cannonading now became general along the entire line. Such a scene, as one terrific and sublime, no mortal eye never rested on before, unless the bombardment of Sebastopol by the combined batteries of France and England revealed a like awful manifestation of the hate and fury of man. The thundering, bellowing roar of hundreds of pieces of artillery, the light pole of missiles—the screaming, hissing, whistling, shrieking projectiles—the wreaths of smoke, as shell after shell burst into the still air, the savage go on of rounded among the trees of the shattered forest, formed a noise likely to sink for ever into the memory of all who witnessed it, but utterly defying verbal delineation. A direct and continuing fire swept each battery upon either side as it was unmasked, volley replied to volley, crash succeeded crash, until the eye lost all power of distinguishing the lines of combatants, and the whole plain seemed a lake of fire, a seething mass of molten lava, coursed over by immeasurable fiends drunk with fury and revenge.

Twice the Federals, gallantly led and encouraged by their officers, dashed against the forces of General A. P. Hill and General Early, and twice they recoiled, broken and dismantled, and incapable of being again rallied by the utmost efforts of their own Confederate guns; but the third time a horrid carnage took place on the plain, and only desisted from the pursuit when they came within the range of the Federal batteries posted on the heights of Fredericksburg. Then General Stuart's Horse Artillery pressed hotly upon the flying foe, and, after a fire, subsequently ascertained to have been very effective, was ordered to open upon the Confederate right, where the antagonists fought upon more level terms, the ground at that point on each side was nearly of the same elevation as itself; but even here the Federal loss in officers and men was enormous, and they were compelled to retire from the field, and to abandon for the present their service, field and steam as the eve of the day which was to be their last approached, and the sun sank behind the mountains which bounded the horizon. Many general officers were carried to the Federal rear grievously wounded, and one of the Confederate officers reported that a well-known General Grey fell upon the right, and only one—General Cobb—upon the left.

Meanwhile, the fiercest and most desperate struggle against the lines of General Hood, A. P. Hill, and Early, was little more than a repetition of what was accomplished with the troops directed by the Federals in the immediate neighbourhood of Fredericksburg. The impression that the Confederate leaders would not be heavily upon the offensive, advancing in their character, for fear of injuring the town of Fredericksburg, is believed to have prevailed among the Northern General officers. But the moment the Federals had fairly entered it they served to show. To the Irish division, commanded by General Meagher, was especially assigned the difficult task of dislodging the troops of the town of Fredericksburg and forming, under the withering fire of the Confederate batteries, to which Marye's Heights, towering immediately in the rear, from Meyer at Fontenay, at Alburn, or at Wabrina was more undoubted courage displayed by the men of the Irish brigade than on the occasion which they directed against the almost impregnable position of their foe.

Than any mortal men could have done the position before which they were wantonly sacrificed, defended as it was, it seems to me idle for a moment to believe; but the valour which in the fatal encounter of the 13th of last month of Colonel Watkins's guns are the best evidence what manner of men they were who were led on to the slaughter. Ireland has indeed had her full share in the gained glory on a thousand battlefields, and never more richly deserved it than at the base of Marye's Heights on the 13th day of December, 1862.

An opportunity of sending this letter, with an encouraging prospect of its reaching England, and not the less favourable account of the gallant deeds done on the Confederate left of the town of Fredericksburg and of the battlefield until a subsequent letter.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The second Monday at "The Corner" finds Lord Clifden a firmer favourite than ever, and a great Derby horse in the betting. Handicappers have mounted their "considering caps" in earnest, and have abandoned the work out for the present. The six great handicaps have abundance of work cut out for them this January, are as nearly as possible equal to the task of framing weights which will place each horse in the race on the same footing as regards chance of success. Assessing is in the former, and in the latter we have Curbiere (who was supposed to have broken down), Thurnall, Gaiety One, Rockfield, Lord Clifden, and Buckstone; while Tun Whiffler and Scoschrometer are supposed to be enjoying the five months' privacy of "a sealed boxinstinct." The last named has not likely in the stables, and, according to some, in the very stall occupied last year by Carnotaeus. Right out of the box Harry Jardine's racehorses were sold at York last week, and Montrose was purchased to lead gallops for the Axke stable. The Life says its annual table, that only by 22 are, to be sold by ledge, dead or out of training in the 268 Derby entries, and 35 in the 101 Oaks entries. The former are now reduced to 246 and the latter to 48. The Sporting Life, applying itself in a very elaborate way to the mania which exists for backing jockeys, proves that any one putting £5 on to Fordham each time he rode last season would have lost exactly £1665; and the Field publishes a letter from Mr. Frank Buckland, the celebrated naturalist, in which he avers it as his opinion that there is no better way of taming vicious horses than placing them in the society of a donkey, and adduces Trumpeter and Umpire as cases in point.

"Deerfoot" and Mills met for their hour-race on Monday, over a very heavy course, at Copenhagen, and the Cockney Indian would never looked better; but Mills did not look or go from the post in his usual free style; and, from the disinclination of many of his friends to back him, it was pretty patent that he had not taken such care of himself in training as usual. Between the seventh and eighth mile Deerfoot began to lead him, but Mills drew it, and recovered so much that at the end of the first ten miles, which was done in 52 min. 8 sec., he led, and there was not much difference between them. At the end of the twelfth mile the Indian made a fine right away from him and made him roll from dizziness. However, he would not give in, but pitched another mile, and at the end of that he stopped as if he was shot, and was supported away; while the Indian, who was nearly twenty yards in front, dashed on, and completed the hour-journey in something like twenty-three or four times into the air with a war-shout, apparently as fresh as if he had been taking an exercise canter. It was said that we are one degree of heat less in the dance covered in the hour was 11 miles 540 yards, or about 180 yards less than was performed by Deerfoot at Beeston. The track was dry, and the atmosphere were much better. Although Mills's friends will have it that the Indian is not thoroughly game, when his opponent has confessed himself to make the pace severe all the way, and to be at a stern chase, he is so for the undoubted champion-runner of the Old and the New World. The future of the pedestrian is not very bright, for a great inferiority in point of strength and muscle, it was a wonderful performance on Mills's part.

Mills and Deerfoot will be the Ten-Mile Champion Cup on Feb. 2; and early in March Mills runs Deerfoot six miles, giving him one hundred yards' start.

Lord Royston and Major Painter have joined the Meltonians; and we regret to hear that, owing to the frost in the early part of last Monday, both Colonel Markham and Captain Wombwell have met with severe falls. It is reported that Sir F. Johnstone and his brother have each made a most excellent debut with the "Quorn Course," as it is called. The Duke's had a very fast forty minutes on Wednesday week, from Hose Gorse to the Revine Wood, only six up at the Earl's Thursday week. Dalby (who advertised four days this week) had a very good 1h. 10m.; and on Friday week (Jan. 3) the Quorn had a most successful run, from which a fox killed. On Saturday The Duke's had a good gallop with an afternoon fox, and on Monday Lord Stamford had a nice outgoing run from Ashby o' Gaunts and killed, which was followed up with a good fox and a satisfactory finish from Barkby Holt.

Lord Strathmore has won for three out of the four great stakes at Ridgway Club (Lytham), one of which was won by Weathercote, a daughter of Hedgegrom and the well-known Attorney. Ashdown Park meeting is now fixed for March 2, and the two leading stakes for 61 dogs, and the 32 beaten in the first ties are framed somewhat on the plan of the Waterloo Cup. Mr. Farrell has not yet appointed a judge. The meetings for next week are Kenilworth (Amicable) on Tuesday; Whitehaven and Cumberland, in the county of Kildare, on Tuesday and Wednesday; Haverfordwest on Tuesday, &c.; Marcehn on Wednesday; Alnour Club on Wednesday and Thursday; and Prees (Salop) on Saturday.

Two lives were lost on the morning of the 6th inst. in the Solent. The Penitensar and Oriental Company's vessel Ceylon was coming up the river, when she ran into a brig which was being towed out to sea. The tug, a steamboat belonging to Wm. Symonds, was lying on board the brig, and the steamboat's crew was killed, and the fireman of the tug was drowned. Other persons suffered severe injuries.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ANDEW.—The very beautiful prize problem by Mr. Saver and Mr. Campbell, in our last, were printed under "Chess Enigmas," because we had not space to present them on Saturday. They merit the attention of every lover of ingenious chess strategy.

R. D. V.—A solution from the match-games lately played, with annotations, is preparing for our Chess Column, and will appear shortly.

J. T. TROUGHTON.—It is now understood that Mr. Steinitz will not play a match with Mr. G. E.—Every day copy of "Lucena" would probably fetch from seventy to one hundred guineas. The beautiful facsimile by the late Mr. Fiorini, of type-founding celebrity, may be bought for a couple of pounds.

J. H. MACKENZIE.—Your last problem, of course would, no doubt, prove highly entertaining and instructive, but it would be to multiply pages beyond our limit. The latter course, we take it, is to print a well-arranged selection, that could hardly fail of being popular.

F. J. DUFFY.—The list was published in our No. 1,147 of 1865.

EXSALSIOR.—Quite wrong. You have forgotten that Black had not castled the Rook.

J. HOPKINSON.—Your solution is correct.

J. HOPKINSON.—Your favour of the 7th inst. duly received. The problem will be published by Mr. Simpson, of King William-street, Charing-cross, we believe, in a few days

J. HOPKINSON.—Your solution is unsound. Mr. Kipping's is the correct one.

W. C.—Nos. 12 and 13 have a second solution. No. 09 shall appear.

W. H. SALTER.—Your solution is correct; but the first move is destructive of all subsequent interest in the game. We shall be glad, however, to see it at your leisure.

J. D.—Your solution is correct.

J. D.—Solutions of Problems Nos. 1 to 129 must be given next week, if we can spare room.

R. H.—Mr. Monday has declined to play chess at present. When he resumes the old amusement it will be time enough to call upon him for the game you desire to see.

SOLUTION OF PROBLEM NO. 931.—By Mr. Kennedy, Mr. W. Ward, Dr. Pole, Mr. Wormald, Mr. Keeble, Mr. Pratt, Mr. Hyde, Mr. W. P. Hewitt, Mr. Wyvill, Rev. Jas. ANCIENT RINGS IN THE POSSESSION OF EDMUND WATERTON, ESQ., OF WALTON HALL, WAKEFIELD.

Our first group of glass includes one specimen of Oriental and four of Venetian manufacture. On the left is a Venetian ewer, of fine form, of white glass, somewhat dusky in colour. It has a trefoil-shaped mouth, and the body is ornamented with flutes and a central band, with two lions and a shield, all moulded in relief. Height, 11 in.: the property of Alexander Barker, Esq. The next is an elegant Venetian ewer of white glass, ornamented with scrolls of foliage in green enamel, among which are small white birds; among the scrolls are also three circular medallions, from which proceed wavy rays, and which have originally contained the monogram "‡R," now defaced; the handle is unfortunately broken off and lost, but our artist has replaced it in the Engraving. This ewer is remarkable for its peculiar decorations and the great lightness of the glass. There is a doubt whether it is Venetian work. It is engraved in "Art-Treasures at Manchester," Vitreous Art, plate 3. Height, 12¼in.: the property of Robert Napier, Esq. To the right of this there is a small Oriental bowl or vase and cover, with a high foot. Both the body and bowl are ornamented with a band composed of three enamel medallions, with patterns in green, white, and red, between which are inscriptions on a blue ground. The rest of the vase has designs in outline, with a number of bands of Oriental characters of a small size. The inscriptions seem to be repetitions of the Arabic title, "The Wise." Height, 10in.: the property of Martin T. Smith, Esq. In the front is a very elegant Venetian tazza of dark bluish green glass; the lower part of the bowl, which is shallow, is moulded like fine basket-work; on the stem are lions' heads and shields in relief. Height, 6¼in.; diameter, 6in.: the property of Alexander Barker, Esq. To this collector also belongs the small cup to the left of this, which is of a brilliant emerald green colour, mounted with two handles, and ornamented bands in gilt metal. Height, 3¼in.

Our second group contains three specimens of Venetian and one of French glass. First, on the left, is a Venetian flask of elegant shape, with vertical ribs, in each of which is a thread of opaque white glass; in the spaces between are fixed small scrolls of opaque glass of different colours; the foot and top are of white metal (Bernal Collection, 2934). Height, 9¼in.: the property of F. Slade, Esq. Next is a fine tall covered Venetian cup of white glass. The bowl and cover are ornamented with projecting spikes of glass; the stem is composed of twisted rods inclosing red, yellow, and blue spirals, and terminating in dragons' heads with blue crests. Height, 16¼in.: the property of Martin T. Smith, Esq. To the right is a Venetian tall-standing cup and cover, of white glass, both ornamented with spiral gilt ribs; the former has a border of scalework. On the top of the cover is a shield of arms purposely erased. This fine specimen is of the fifteenth century. Engraved in "Art-Treasures at Manchester," Vitreous Art. Height, 16¼in.: the property of F. Slade, Esq. In front of this is a most noteworthy French drinking-glass on slender stem. It adds greatly to the interest of this specimen that its French origin is unquestionable. Although it is certain that very extensive manufactories of glass existed in France during the sixteenth century, the absence of any sure marks of their nationality renders it difficult to identify their products. The bowl, which is very wide, is divided into three compartments by enamelled lines; in one of the compartments is represented a gentleman with dress, holding a flower, and with the motto, IE VIVRAY; in another compartment is a lady holding a heart, MO CVEVR AYME; in the third compartment is a device, consisting of a goat (bouc) trying to climb out of a vase of water (eau), being a rebus of the name of Boucau; round the rim is a gilt band, in which is left clear, by taking away portions of the gold, an inscription as follows: IE SVIS A VOVS ICELAN BOVCAV ET AVOVSAVSY POVC. It is of early sixteenth-century work, and was engraved in "Art-Treasures at Manchester," Vitreous Art, p. 10. Height, 6¾in.; diameter of bowl, 6¼in. A family of the name of Boucault was settled in Provence: the property of F. Slade, Esq.

Two especially remarkable collections of clocks and watches have been contributed to the South Kensington Museum—namely, those of C. O. Morland, Esq., and Lady Fellows. Mr. Morland's collection was in four classes, illustrating the construction of watches from the period of their invention, about 1500 to 1540, down to the eighteenth century. We now engrave a very interesting clock-watch from this collection, which has an astrolabe for taking astronomical observations. The rose is engraved with the fixed stars revolving as the index to the hours; date about 1530-40. This is the first instrument by which the longitude could be found at sea. The characters are all Arabic.

The most memorable watch in Lady Fellows's collection—the watch worn by Oliver Cromwell—has already been illustrated. We now engrave four other remarkable watches from this collection. We regret to say, however, they have been withdrawn from public exhibition. The first is an oval silver watch (variety of form being a common characteristic of early watches), with gilt face and two dials; one showing the hour, the other—with signs of the zodiac—the month and day of the month. The face also indicates the age of the moon, day of the week, &c.: maker, William North, London, seventeenth century. The second is a crystal-cased watch, fluted with fluted rays; silver dial and silver outer case; maker, Aymé Noel, seventeenth century. In the centre is an octagonal metal-gilt watch, with crystal face and small dial; on the back of the watch is a small pendulum, which projects below to the edge of the case; seventeenth century. To the right is an oval metal-gilt watch, engraved with sacred subjects and inscriptions; a silver band round the side of scriptural subjects, and inside the lids the Crucifixion and offerings of the Magi: maker, John Wrighte, seventeenth century.

The "Sevigne," of gold open filagree scrolls set with pearls, is an example of Spanish work of the seventeenth century, in that branch of jewellery which was carried to such perfection by Cellini and others in Italy. It is one of many contributions by the Rev. J. Beck, a gentleman to whom we are likewise indebted for the arrangement and descriptive notices in the catalogue of the historical miniatures, and some other portions of the Loan Collection.

MR. WATERTON'S ANCIENT RINGS.

Among the works of art in the Loan Collection at the South Kensington Museum was a collection of rings formed by Edmund Waterton, Esq., for the purpose of illustrating the history of fingerrings from the earliest date. A few of these have been selected for illustration.

Gold Etruscan ring. Around the hoop are figures of Hercules and Juno Lanuvians in relief. Hercules is clad in the spoils of a lion, and Juno in those of a goat. With his right hand Hercules holds the scalus, or knot, which Juno grasps with her left, and she in her right holds the gavy or girdle, the other end of which Hercules seizes with his left. In the space between the girdle and knot a small scarab is set. This ring was found in the Maremma in 1855, and weighs 475 grains.

Silver ring, curiously ornamented with lacerine work. North Saxon workmanship of the eleventh century. Found in the Thames at Chelsea in 1856.

A gold Hebrew wedding-ring of the latter part of the fifteenth century.

Gold Merovingian ring, with a projecting bezel set with a sapphire en cabochon. A similar ring is in the museum at the Porte de Hal, in Brussels.

Gold enamelled ring, of the sixteenth century, set with a turquoise and surrounded by six garnets. This ring is stated to have subsequently belonged to Frederick the Great, of Prussia, whose orphar is cut upon it.

Ring of horn or of hoof, surrounded by a thin hoop of silver, and with a bezel of silver affixed, in which is set a crapaudine or toadstone. A ring of the hoof of an ass was held to be efficient against epilepsy; and, although the fable of the stone in the head of a toad has long been exploded, it may be amusing to read the following description of the "crapaudine," which is given by Nicholas de Nic "Lapidary:"— "Some say this stone is found in the head of an old toade: others say that the old toade must be laid upon the cloth that is red and it will belch it up, or otherwise not. You may give a like credit to both these reports, for as little truth is to be found in them as may possibly be. Witness Anselmus Boetius, in lib. ij. in the chapter on this stone, who saith that, to try this experiment in his youth, he took an old toade and laid it upon a red cloth, and watched it a whole night to see it belch up his stone; but after his long and tedious watchful expectation he found the old toade in the same posture to gratify the great pange of his whole night's roadmesse."

The King of Henry, Lord Darnley, husband to the unfortunate Mary Queen of Scots. On the bezel it bears the two initials M. H., united by a lover's knot, and within the name HENRI L. DARNLEY, and his arms as Duke of Albany, and the year of their marriage, 1565.

Massive gold signet, bearing the bust of a man, and the name +AVFERT OF ALFERT. This and the preceding one are of Anglo-Saxon workmanship.

Gold ring, chased, bezel formed of two birds, possibly intended for peacocks. Byzantine.

Gold Italian ring, fifteenth century; found at Foggio Mirabebo, in 1860.

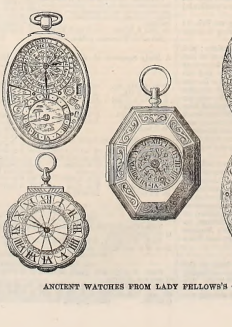
Massive gold signet, with the rebus of the Wylmot family. On the foot of the tree there is an E, on one side WY, and on the other OT. Supposing the tree to be an elm, the name reads Wy-elm-ot, or Wylmot. Fourteenth century.

Silver nielloed ring, with the head of a lady, and in front of her face a flower. Rings of this sort were used as engagement rings in the sixteenth century in Italy. They are very rare.

Massive gold ring, nielloed, and bearing the name +ALHSTAN, the letter N being represented by a Rune. This is generally believed to have been the ring of Alhstan, who was Bishop of Sherborne from A.D. 823 to 867. It is fully described in the "Archæologia," vol. xv., p. 47.

Gold signet, with a coronet I. This is an early example of this type of signet, and gold rings of this class are most rare.

CLOCK-WATCH, WITH ASTROLABE.



ANCIENT WATCHES FROM LADY FELLOWS'S COLLECTION.

NEW HOMES FOR THE WORKING CLASSES.

HAVE our town improvers yet discovered the folly of attempting to do their work without a preliminary consideration of all the more important issues involved? Every high time they should do so. Never perhaps was a more signal illustration afforded of the evil that may be unintentionally done while thinking only of legitimate works of improvement than in the various architectural operations in London during the last few years. New and noble streets have been erected, always have been advanced into the suburbs parts of the metropolis; while to make room for these and similar works large masses of squalid and filthy houses have been swept away. Is not all this admirable, especially the last part of the business, which has resulted in the demolition of so many dens of vice and misery? Go into the districts in question and you will get your answer. Look at what you have admired the stately facades, the breadth of the streets, and the immense gain to the general convenience of the vast thoroughfares; go down the lanes you can from the neighbourhood (it hardly matters in what direction) and note carefully what you find there. You will be struck before you considerably advance with the same original bad quality as those which have been pulled down, but made infinitely worse while becoming proportionately denser than before. Is not this a very large generality? Why should you wonder at such a result? The matter is very simple. A large, poor, and wretchedly housed but hard-working population had a certain number of tenements to accommodate a certain and very large number of men, women, and children within a certain area of convenient locomotion. Suddenly your improver starts into activity—destroys at one fell swoop scores, perhaps hundreds, of these dwellings—makes no sort of new provision for the poor class of people whose former miserable lot now becomes inhabitants to flock for shelter to the buildings that do remain. Then, of course, they enter upon a new and terrible competition with the existing tenants, which is for the most part finally settled by fresh discoveries in the art of huddling the largest possible number of human beings into the smallest possible space, with the little regard to sex, decency, or morality, and with no regard at all to the common principles of health, or efficiency for daily labour. Has been the constant character of our greatest metropolitan improvements. Not that London has been any worse, probably, than Liverpool, or Manchester, or Birmingham, or Glasgow in this principle, or absence of principle, must everywhere produce the like effect. It is not that the object of improvement or the improvement is wrong in the special things undertaken, but that there is or has been a recklessness that almost becomes criminal in refusing to consider the after consequences upon the poorer classes who are so little able to help themselves.

But this has been recognised at last. Lord Derby—to his honour be it recorded—has taken the lead in enforcing the novel but obviously right and necessary rule that the promoters of improvements shall make due provision for the people they displace. This ought henceforward to be made an invariable condition of every legislative authority for the passing of any bill for the purpose. It must then have the satisfaction—a very humble one, certainly—of knowing that we are not directly and ostensibly adding to the misery of the working classes to be made inexhaustibly worse in order that in convenience or beauty our cities may become a little better.

But how are we to combat effectually the way of even keeping matters as they are—that is, the continual increase of the population. Now, as London is the largest town in size as in population, the number (in the localities we are at present referring to), steady and serious effort on the part of philanthropists is necessary to prevent there "being more than a very few of the miserable wretches who are forced from becoming perfect nests of fever, degradation, and misery. But such men, and the people who do the best work of London, have their buildings have been erected, many old ones repaired and purified. The late estimable Prince Albert gave a powerful impulse to the public consideration of this sympathy. Of late years, too, the most earnest work of womanly love and Christian charity, Miss Coutts has erected a large quarter of model dwellings, but on some scale not at all at a substantial benefit of her act by the very "beautiful clock-tower recently erected in its centre.

But what are these things but like trying to still a roaring and raging sea by pouring drops of oil upon it? There is good done here and there, but the great mass of misery remains untouched on a seemingly hopeless scale of magnitude. It is estimated that not less than 200,000 of the poor will be turn out in one or other of the ways we remarks as there are souls to be regarded when we intend to talk only of bodies) that are now living in this, the first city of the world in wealth and civilisation, in a state that cannot for a moment be compared in point of physical welfare with that of our beasts of burden.

Yet there are those who do the best work of London who, with struggle on with gallant perseverance, maintaining their independence to the last; making no unmanly moan, submitting to the inevitable calamities of life, but with Christian faith and fortitude to the very end with Christian knowledge and culture. Are they to be helped? Not fitfully and spasmodically, but on some scale and in a manner worthy of our knowledge, progress, and means, and calculated to cope effectually with the herculean difficulties of the task?

We cannot but guess that Mr. Peabody's magnificent gift will be the first and most promising indication that a right answer is about to be given to the question. We should but see in it a proof of the power and the strength that is likely to set on foot a great social revolution which shall not cease till every family in the empire is wholesomely and comfortably housed. If our great towns are all that they may be quite sure that the country districts cannot remain unchanged. For these even now have to feel their character and influence. Neither country gentlemen will not allow so great a blot to remain upon the national life, to be a perpetual source of contrast and of discontent with their own more favourable lot. Mr. Peabody, as we learned by nobler motives, are already at work. But we do not at present propose to treat of the agricultural labourer, but of the town poor. It is obvious reasons for considering separately the wants of the two classes of the people; for, generally, small houses and cheap garden land are desired by the one, while to the other gardens are unattainable, and large high houses necessary on account of the value of the soil. Let us then consider for what is the present grouped for working classes in the denser parts of our great city.

A hundred and two thousand pounds! This was the sum that the eminent American merchant proposed to bestow on the poor of London in recognition of their state and his own profitable connection with our country. The first board of trustees are all men of wealth and gratification, and many of us have speculated on the use to which the trustees will put so large a sum. That matter is not settled yet precisely as we could have wished. The money is not to be fritte away among a dozen different objects; the whole of it is to be devoted to the amelioration of the dwellings of our city. Not a penny to public homes of the working class. We are further told that plans are in progress, and to be before long laid before the public, and be matured into effect. This, then, is a favourable moment for glancing rapidly at the more essential elements of the matter; and it we do not pretend to do more than this, by anything we may say, we shall put the minds of the excellent men chosen by the founder to realise his noble views at ease as to anything so familiar to the experience of our readers with what we conceive to be the object thereto be sought.

First, we do not want to build homes for that large and in every way interesting class of the population, who, however poor and badly lodged, are still able to do something towards their own social improvement—namely, we mean, the upper stratum of each of the labouring poor. The first thing we come to, but we must deal with the worst cases first as far as possible, it seems to us, that should guide all the operations should be that of providing homes for the very poorest and most wretchedly-housed classes only. Let us have, ideally, a row of four-line, below which we know a single family can be allowed to sink, but above which everything is left untouched. To accomplish this, the rent must be at least as low as the lowest of existing rents; but this secured—and in combination with clean, sound, and well-ventilated rooms—the private speculator would be at once driven from the field, or compelled to do what is far more desirable, and what is finally the one thing needful, to make his own houses as good and as cheap. Then, then, is the problem to be solved. We want healthy and comfortable homes for at least 200,000 people at the price now paid for unhealthy and squalid ones: a formidable difficulty! How can it best be met? If even so large a sum as a hundred and fifty thousand pounds be devoted exclusively to the erection of new model houses, with the freehold—or at least an easy perpetual—tenure of the land, we shall have helped just so many people as will be fortunate enough to become their tenants, but the great sea of domestic discomfort will remain unaffected. But if the experience of the admirable Cottage Improvement Society of Hastings be borne in mind, we shall be drawn to the conclusion that it is the conversion of existing tenements, not their destruction, that will enable us to meet any question of the kind (size of dwelling and all). That society has paid ten per cent interest to its members for several years; and, though we do not hold it up as a model for Mr. Peabody's trustees, who do not need, and ought not to take, above half that interest for the money laid out, we do strenuously urge that they are interested the due consideration of this most important point. Think how easy it will be, by large contracts with public spirited builders, to have an immense number of houses repaired, made sound and healthy with every substantial requisite as fast as the house themselves can be purchased and handed over! Of course there will have to be carefully-devised preliminary plan. Not a single house should be left with a leaky roof, decayed walls or floors, or imperfect drainage. Sufficient sites for playgrounds, schools, and churches must obviously be secured. Not a room but should have its fireplace, chimney, and ventilation. Not a single house but should have its own without. And as such houses are always in rows, or blocks, it would not be at all difficult or expensive to add two advantages which would be extended of the very highest value to the poor. One is the promptly dispose of the one, and pipes with hot water circulating to and fro would be required for the latter. The second would be to let a house set apart for the residence of a man who should see to it, and who might collect the rents, and receive a certain low salary for exacting control over the management of the houses, so as to see that they were not abused.

While, however, we would look to this simple and effective yet eminently conservative measure to deal at once, by its own force and by the force of its influence upon existing tenements, with the worst of the existing masses of tenements that desecrate the name of home, we do not think Mr. Peabody's munificence should be exclusively confined to this. We would have the trustees, if they see their way clearly, should engage and exhaust the resources of science in devising the best and cheapest means for housing populations in the centres of towns. It is impossible to say how much may not be done simultaneously in both directions—antagonistic as the two look—if we call together our best engineers, our best architects, our best sanitary men, and practical builders; our inventors, philanthropists, and social improvers. Let them consider and give the public opinion the benefit of whatever is of intrinsic value in our club system. Their food might be purchased and dressed better and more cheaply by their own joint arrangements. Let the best of the dwellings have a large room, at least, might be set aside on the ground floor for a common dining-room. Let the principle of the club, the transaction of business—individual or corporate—that might be found desirable. Then the different floors might be adapted to the means of different grades of poor. Let the highest too expensive for the well-paid artisan, and the least eligible being within the means of the lowest. Let the whole be constructed in towers, with galleries (which would add to the picturesqueness of the exterior and the roominess of the interior); or inside, every set of rooms about them into the galleries, and every room to have its own access from any kind of intrusion. If the buildings are very large and high, a shaft with a lift (as in the Tower of Babel) might be added. The sick, infirm, or heavily-laden, might be raised by a mere touch of their own hands, as in the co-operative cotton-mill, at Rochdale. In cases even of different grades, a lavatory with hot and cold water for clothes, a playground for the children, and afford a pleasant promenade on the roof—perhaps with a band playing—might be properly guarded by a wall, which might be made to add dignity to the appearance of the roof of the pile. And this reminds us to say that the working classes are not, as love very much to think, poor in artistic sense. It would be worse than absurd to spend a considerable sum of money in the construction of a block of model houses and all it should be at least handsome in general form and proportions, regarded in its aspect, and cheerful-looking as regard to the colour. These might each have a single window tax, high enough to hold and conceal a row of pots, above which the plants and flowers, which there were any love of nature, many would be sure to cultivate and afford solace to many within pining for a sight or smell of the fresh country. These artistic instincts cannot prudently be neglected, even in the poorest of homes.

In certain localities where shops may be needed it would be well to encourage the construction of a row of shops on the ground floor to lessen the rent of the upper stories and bring together the tradesmen and their customers. Such a plan, however, would require careful watching lest any harm than good would be done with this kind of interference with trade. All such matters should be regarded as only fairly falling within the scope of the trustees' duties and not entered into any too obviously a necessary or advisable part of the original scheme. Every available shilling should be devoted to the first object, which is, as this be now done with as much vigour and skill as the case admits of we believe the results will be a series of clearly-marked steps—from philanthropic to ordinary speculation—from London to the other great towns of the empire—from the towns to the country, and so taking us in the end to the most favourable and long-sought-for point of all, that one when we may not only wish, with Henry IV. of France, that every working man in the kingdom shall be able to have his pullet, or its equivalent, in the pot, but that every one shall be able to put in the meantime he has obtained at least a house and a fireside where he can sit down in comfort and peace and rest his head at night, and feel that he and his family are no longer in danger of pollution by the very denial to them of all the decent necessities of a Christian and civilised home.

THE CITY OF MEXICO.

THE doings of the French forces in Mexico have naturally caused public opinion to be directed to its capital, towards which they are preparing for an early advance. We have, therefore, given on pages 64 and 65 a panoramic view of this fine city. Mexico is 7468ft. above the level of the sea. It stands nearly in the centre of an extensive plain, which, from being surrounded by high hills or mountains, is commonly called the Vale of Tenochtitlan, which was the name given to the town before the year 1530. This vale has an oblong form, extending from south to north fifty-two miles, and from east to west thirty-four miles. Its circuit, measured along the crest of the ranges which inclose it, is nearly 205 miles; and its area is 1710 square miles, or nearly equal in extent to the county of Lancaster; but about one-tenth of its surface, or 164 square miles, is occupied by four lakes. The largest of these lakes, that of Texcuco, which covers a surface of seventy-seven square miles, occupies the centre of the vale, and is only about three feet and a half lower than the great square of the town, which stands on its western shore, on a swampy ground. Towards the southern extremity of the vale is the lake of Chalco, which contains a small island and the pleasant village of Xico, and is separated by a line from the lake of Xochimilco. The surfaces of these two lakes is nearly four feet above the great square in the town, and they occupy nearly fifty square miles. Their water is fresh, while that of the other lakes is brackish or salt. North of the lake of Texcuco is the lake of St. Cluadio, which covers about twenty-seven square miles, and is nearly twelve feet higher than that of Texcuco. It is divided into two parts by a dike, and its northern portion is called the lake of Zumpango. The north-western corner of the vale is occupied by the lake of Zumpango, which is likewise divided into two portions by a causeway. The western lake is that of Xoyotepec, and the western that of Zuldatpec. This lake is nearly thirty feet above the lake of Texcuco, but occupies only ten square miles. During the rainy season, the surface, determined chiefly from the ranges which inclose the vale, is poured into these lakes, and, as they have no outlet, their superfluous quantity enters the lake of Zampango, which is the most elevated. It frequently happened that in very wet seasons the water which accumulated in these lakes inundated the lower parts of the vale, and rose several feet in the streets of Mexco. To prevent such an occurrence the Spanish Government caused a canal to be dug through the mountains of Nochistongo, which lie north-west of the lake of Zumpango, by which the superabundant water from the lake is carried off. This stupendous work, known by the name of the Tajo of Nochistongo, is about twelve miles long, and for more than 1000 yards is cut through the solid rock to the depth of 200ft.

The mountains which inclose the vale are lowest on the north side, where they rise only a few hundred feet above the level grounds of the vale, but they are higher on the other sides, especially on the south and south-east. Near the south-eastern angle is Mount Istaccihuatl, which is 17,343ft. high, and is always clad in snow. On the south it is connected by a ridge with Mount Popocatepetl, which is 17,884ft. high, and also always covered with snow. It is connected by a ridge with Mount Ajusco, which is 13,420ft. high. Further south, but without the height of 17,884ft. The surface of the vale itself is not a level plain, but is intersected by very irregularly shaped rocks, which are sometimes isolated and sometimes in groups and connected together. The most remarkable are the Cuests de Barcuotes, north of the town, which rises 288ft. above its base; and the Cerro de Guadalupe, which is to the north-east, and rises 1035ft. above the lowest part of the vale. The descents from the western range and the lakes are rarely studded with villages and towns, and contain numerous fields of cultivated ground, the wheat and the other grains and vegetables of Europe are raised in abundance; large herds of cattle graze on the lakes are reared, and the nature being covered with a saline efflorescence, and the cultivated spots and villages are distant from one another.

Mexico is one of the largest towns in the world. In the dry season it is at some distance from the lake of Texcuco, whose waters in the rainy season are sometimes driven entirely over it to the eastern border of the town, which is protected against inundations by dikes. The streets are very wide, and at right angles to each other, so that by looking down any two of them you can see where they cross each other, the spectator commands a view of nearly the whole town. They are lined with footpaths for the walks of the foot passers. The private houses, though spacious, are rather low, seldom exceeding one story; but, being constructed either of amygdaloid or porphyry, they look on an air of solidity and of magnificence. The moderate height of the public as well as private buildings is owing partly to the difficulty of laying the foundations, which are so insecurely found at a very few feet from the surface, and partly to the frequency of earthquakes. In consequence of the water all the larger buildings are raised upon piles. The roofs of the houses are flat, and as they sometimes communicate with one another for a considerable distance, they afford a safe promenade in the cool of the evening. The best apartments, which are generally painted, are towards the street, and all the windows are protected by gratings.

The squares are spacious, and generally surrounded by buildings of a town about as a good style of architecture. The principal square in the Plaza Mayor, which, on two sides, is surrounded by the cathedral, and the palace, and on the two other sides by shops and dwellings-houses, with the mint, the hall of the Inquisition, and the palace of Cortez. In the centre of the square was formerly a magnificent equestrian statue of Charles IV., by Tolsa, which has been removed since the Revolution. This square is the market for vegetables and fruits, those of the south of Europe being cultivated in the vale of Tenochtitlan itself, while the fruits of the north are brought from the plain of Cuantla Amilpas and from Istla. Manufactured goods are sold in the shops under the colonnades, of which there are several on a large scale, and all well supplied with goods from Europe and China. Several principal shops open into the Portales, and immediately petty vendors, the lesser ones, crowded with their stalls, boxes and in baskets. The Parian, or bazaar, is a square building, divided into narrow compartments for the cross streets, and others subdividing it. The palace, in which the Viceroy formerly was lodged, and which at present serves as the residence of the President of the United States, and also contains the Senate House and all the principal public offices, is a building of great extent, being 600ft. in front, and under cover it contains separate staircases and suites of apartments. One of these courts contains the Botanic Garden, which, however, has been much neglected of late. The College of Mines is a large edifice, built in a plain and magnificent style; but, though handed barely seventy years ago, it is falling to ruins from the defect in the foundations. It contains a rich collection of minerals, and in one of its rooms a professor gives lectures on chemistry and mineralogy. The Academy of the great prints, is a noble building, which contains a collection of about 1200 prisoners. The Hospital, now converted into artillery barracks, is a large edifice. The University is also a large building, but is not distinguished by taste or magnificence; it contains a collection of Mexican antiquities, among which is the celebrated stone of Montezuma. The Academy of Fine Arts, which is a fine building, has a great collection of models, with casts of all the best statues of ancient and modern times, and a gallery of paintings.

The numerous churches and convents, with their cupolas and steeples, give the town a magnificent appearance. The cathedral stands on the north-east front of the Plaza Mayor, and is 426ft. long and 203ft. broad, and has a fine Gothic architecture; but the interior, which is very handsome. The entire character is lofty, magnificent, and imposing. In the outer wall of this church is fixed the bolisteck, a circular stone, covered with hieroglyphic figures, by which the Aztecs or Mexicans used to reckon the months of the year, and which is supposed to have formed a perpetual calendar. Another ancient monument of the Aztec Empire is distinguished by its extent, architectural beauty, and wealth.

The Alameda, or public walk in the south-westernmost of the town, resembles a park. It is laid out in lines, diverging from different centres, and is planted with a great variety of trees. In the centre of the Alameda, which is fed by water from the great aqueduct leading from Santa Fé to the city. The water is carried along in trenches, in so far as water has passed, and is discharged into the lake of Texcuco. As the ground on which the city stands is so soft, the roads leading to it are raised six or eight feet above its level; they are broad, paved in the middle, and bordered by stone with double rows of trees. These roads, called paseos, afford delightful road.

As the water of the lake of Texcuco is even saltier than that of the Baltic, according to the experiments of Humboldt, and as the water which is found a few feet under the surface is also brackish, the city is supplied with drinkable water by two aqueducts, which bring it down from sources situated in the mountains west of the vale. The larger aqueduct, leading from Santa Fé to the Alameda, and thence to the lake, is 11,135 yards long, and in one-third of its course is supported by arches of stone and brick plastered over. Its water, which is very pure, is distributed through the city. The other aqueduct, that of Chapultepec, is 3638 yards long, and rests on 904 arches, which are 9½ft. apart, and the columns 4ft. thick; the width is about 6½ft.; the stream of water is 2½ft. wide, and 3ft. deep. This water, which is less pure, is consumed in the suburbs contiguous to the city on the south.

The city is partly supplied with provisions and vegetables by small boats, which bring them over the lake of Texcuco; but as the lake is very shallow in January and February, the supply is then generally stopped, and the city depends, especially for vegetables, on the supply by the canal of Ixtapalapan, which leads from the lake of Xochimilco to the town. This canal is narrow, but is always covered with small canoes loaded with fruits and vegetables. It passes through the Chinampas, or floating gardens, which, in their present state, are long narrow strips of ground, redeemed from the surrounding swamp and inundated by small canals. They are well cultivated, bound in fine vegetables, and their edges are planted with poplars. It is stated that they originally consisted of wooden rafts, covered with earth, and floated about in the lake when it was full of water, whence their name is derived. At present they are stationary, but it is said that there are still some floating gardens in the lake of Xochimilco.

The most remarkable object in the environs of Mexico is the Palace of Chapoltepec, which is built on a rock, to the foot of which the water of the lake of Texcuco extended at the time of the conquest by Cortes (1521). The palace, which was built by one of the Viceroys of Mexico, is properly a fortress: but it is now in a very dilapidated state. The place is frequently visited by the natives and foreigners on account of the fine view it affords over the city and the greater part of the vale of Tenochtitlan.

The population of Mexico has been variously estimated—some accounts fixing it at from 140,000 to 150,000, whilst by other authorities it is stated to exceed 200,000. It consists mostly of creoles, or descendants of Spaniards and Indians. The lowest class of the people—Sarngates, Guachinangos, or Leperos—live in a state of abject poverty, which is owing to their indolent habits. They amount to about 30,000. The manufactures are not important, except those of plate and tobacco, which latter is carried on for the benefit of the Government, as in all the Mexican States. Gold lace is also made. There are also a few manufactures of soap, cotton, and hats; but by far the greatest part of the manufactured goods for the consumption of the inhabitants are imported from Europe: silk stuffs, and especially stockings, also from China. The commerce of Mexico is limited to the importation of these foreign goods, and to the exportation of the produce of the mines.

MEXICAN COSTUMES.

IN our representation of Mexican costumes on page 73, the scene is laid in one of the suburban villages of the city of Mexico. In the background is an Indian trotting off to the market with his huanacha wicker cage—upon his shoulders, probably full of chickens. He "bowls" along, his eyes fixed upon the ground, apparently lost in thought, and nothing regardless of all which passes by. To the left, mounted on a spirited yegua (mare), a descendant, doubtless, of the Arabian race of horses, is a well-to-do ranchero (owner of a rancho or farm). The central figure, who is dismounted, is also a farmer, in his ordinary Sunday or feast-day dress. His calsoneros, or leather trousers, open from above the knee, are set off with silver buttons, and show his white calsones (drawers). The bota campanera—of stamped leather, embroidered with gold, silver, and coloured silk threads—is fastened at the knee, and protects the ankle and foot. Between this and the knee is stuck the knife, carried for the double purpose of protection and cutting the reata, or leash of the horse. His roomy cotona (jacket) is of coffee-coloured leather, handsomely embroidered with coloured silk, and from the shoulders of which are hung a number of silver pendants, called almanes. A Chinese sash of red or flesh-coloured silk is girt round his waist, and the ends, which fall behind him, terminate in gold tassels. The most striking part of this picturesque and certainly appropriate dress of the habitual horseman is the sombrero. Its wide brim, sewn round on the inner side with three or four bands of woven silver and gold threads, each band varying in width from 3in. to 1in.; the heavy large silver or gold chapetas (ornaments fastened on to the side of the crown, often in the form of the Mexican eagle, &c.): the thick gold toquilla (in the form of a snake, generally), coiled round the base of the crown, with silver fastenings, combine to make it a ponderous covering for the head, but one that is very useful to guard off the fierce rays of the sun, and often adopted by Europeans in the Republic. Thrown over his saddle, or fastened upon the vaquilla of the horse, will be his manga (a kind of cloak). Another remarkable feature is the spurs: these have immense rowels in the form of a wheel. Ordinarily the projections on these wheels are quite blunt, and, as the wheel revolver, are really less painful and damaging to the horse than the needle-like instruments worn in this country. The material of which the espuelas (spurs) is made is often of silver, but some are of blue steel, inlaid with silver. The fastenings of the spurs at the side of the foot have large chapetas of silver. The horse is no less costly furnished than its rider. The foundation (taste) of the saddle (silla) is of wood, covered with pig-skin, and the trappings are of stamped leather, highly embroidered with gold, silver, and silk threads, silver buttons, buckles, chapetas, studs, &c. The anquera is also of stamped leather, and entirely covers the haunches of the horse. Upon this, and attached to the high projection at the back of the saddle, is the goat or tiger-skin vaquilla, which serves the purpose of the Highlander's sporan, and also to protect the zarape or manga from the sweat of the horse. The bridle is also studded with silver buttons, and the bit ornamented with large round massive chapetas. The weight of silver (and even gold) ornaments on the head and the back of the saddle, on the large Moorish stirrups, the trappings, bridle, bit, &c., is most extravagant, and often carried to ridiculous extent. The never-failing reata (lasse) is coiled up and fastened to the side of the saddle by one of the many useful correas, soft calf-skin thongs, which are drawn through two holes made close to each other in the saddle, vaquilla, &c., and knotted over chapetas, which serve to tie up the zarape (bags with provisions, &c.) The leather-covered sword is hung by a strap from the saddle-bows, and stuck through the broad stirrup straps, leaving the hilt quite free and handy, and the revolvers or other pistols carried at the waist of the rider or in the pockets of the vaquilla. Thus appears the frank, good-natured, and generally honest ranchero when in the village, or on visiting the capital. The Indians alongside him make a striking contrast to this gay cavalier. Their deep humility sets off the exuberant spirits and dashing air of the farmer, and their rags his dazzling glitter. The boys are collecting the tuns of the cactus, called tunil. This fruit is a species of fig, and very palatable: it also makes an excellent preserve, especially the light-green coloured one, called cjoncoxie. One of the stereotyped churches, with dome and two towers, a sandy road, the beautiful sauce (willow bearing quantities of red berries), the magney—(a cactus from which the famous drink pulque is made), complete the picture. Our View is taken from the exquisite work, published in Mexico, by Mexican artists, called "Mexico y sus Alrededores."

NUREMBERG CASTLE.

NOT the least interesting and picturesque feature in the most complete mediæval town in Europe—Nuremberg—is the ancient "Kaiserliche Burg" or Imperial Castle, situated on a sandstone eminence to the north of the town, which it overlooks and commands. Through quaint old streets of trascried windows and pointed gables, once busy with the hum of active commercial and manufacturing life, but now comparatively silent and deserted, we gradually ascend the toilsome Burgstrasse, and finally, reaching the massive gateway at the summit, pass beneath its frowning arch and come into the outer court, from which one of the most charming views of ancient Nuremberg—is the ancient "Kaiserliche Burg" or Imperial Castle, situated on a sandstone eminence to the north of the town, which it overlooks and commands. Through quaint old streets of trascried windows and pointed gables, once busy with the hum of active commercial and manufacturing life, but now comparatively silent and deserted, we gradually ascend the toilsome Burgstrasse, and finally, reaching the massive gateway at the summit, pass beneath its frowning arch and come into the outer court, from which one of the most charming views of ancient tower and spire, pinnacled roofs and castle wall, wide, smiling plain and distant mountain, may be seen. After sufficiently enjoying the lovely landscape and fresh breeze, we pass beneath another "castle gate" and enter the second court, in which grows the celebrated limetree, planted according to tradition by the Empress Cunigunde, seven hundred years ago. Its widespreading branches are supported by a noble trunk of about fifteen feet circumference, and beneath the chequered shade of its leafy cover, the parades of little feathered songsters are placed emblematic statues of Bavaria, Swabia, Wurtemberg, and the Tyrol—silent guardians of the territories which lie spread out like a map at their feet. Beyond this court we come upon another gloomy portal, which is opened, not, as we might expect, by some mail-clad warder, but by a neat, clean, garrulous little woman, who acts as cicerone over the Royal apartments, which still retain their magnificent old earthenware stoves, furniture, and paintings. There are still other curiosities to be noted here. In a horrid little dank, close room are preserved some of those dreadful instruments of torture with which our amiable ancestors wrung truth from reluctant lips. Here is the celebrated Virgin or Maiden, covered with spikes internally, which pressed against the incarcerated criminal; here are the thumbscrew, bootjack, and other elegant little inventions of the Middle Ages; and, moreover, books with plates descriptive of the several methods of application. Ah! the place is stifling. We wish to hear the song of birds once more, and breathe kind Heaven's air; and so we wend forth again, and, taking the west part the ramparts, walk meditatively to the silent graveyard of the Church of St. John, and linger over the tombs of names dear to all lovers of literature and art, and chiefly over his, the well-beloved Albrecht Durer:

"Emigravit" is the inscription on the tombstone where he lies:
Dead he is not—but departed; for the artist never dies.

No. 1185.—VOL. XLII. SATURDAY, JANUARY 24, 1863. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

MARRIAGE OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES.

WITHIN a few weeks the eldest son of our most gracious Sovereign, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, Heir Apparent of the British throne, will have assumed the full dignity of manhood by marriage with the Princess Alexandra of Denmark. The preliminary formalities, for the most part, have been arranged and the contract signed. The approval of Parliament will, no doubt, be hearty and unanimous, and the celebration, in March, is anticipated with more than ordinary interest, not simply as a magnificent State pageant, but as a public fact of the highest importance to the future well-being of the kingdom. We may be pardoned, therefore, if, on the threshold of the event, we pause for a moment and endeavour to catch and indicate its national bearings.

Marriage is one of the epochs of life which, more perhaps than any other, gives its own colour to human character and destiny. Two hearts are thereby brought into closest contact, and, wherever love is in the ascendant, each becomes the complement of the other. The effect on both is usually looked forward to with hope, and, where there is a real and natural affinity between them, the result generally corresponds with the expectation. It is for this reason that we take a deep personal interest in the marriage of those whose future is, to any extent, mixed up with our own. We are gladdened by the thought that a new, a conservative, a refining and purifying element has been added to an existing combination of qualities which happens to be linked, more or less closely, with the conditions of our own being. Self-love as well as sympathy prompts us to anticipate the union with hope and joy, and with more than common cordiality we breathe forth a prayer that the marriage may be a happy one.

THE ROYAL MEET OF THE WEST NORFOLK HUNT AT SNETTISHAM: GOING TO COVER.—SEE SUPPLEMENT, PAGE 101.

In England we have learned by a double experience how closely the higher interests of the kingdom are touched by a loyal marriage. Confining our attention to that aspect of the matter which we can study with unalloyed thankfulness, we are under an abiding sense of the incalculable good which this country realized, during a long term of years, from the union of our beloved Queen with the late and still deeply lamented Prince Albert. We are but beginning to discover the vast extent to which, as a people, we were indebted to that man's rings for those characteristics of our national life which rinse for those characteristics of our national life which we now survey with pardonable pride. The influence which so unmistakably descended from the summit of society with all the steadiness of a trade-wind, which penetrated and freshened the obscurest homes, imparted health to the domestic virtues, quickened the pulse of industry, gave new life to social benevolence, promoted the germination and growth of a taste for art, science, and education, and kept the vessel of the State in its true constitutional course, has operated, perhaps, more powerfully than any other flowing from human sources, to exalt and dignify this realm. We felt the effect long before we were fully aware of its cause. We never knew the opiciousness of the spring until death sealed it up. It is no matter of surprise, therefore, that, as a nation, we should await with liveliest interest the wedding of the Prince of Wales, or that in our expectations we should associate with it all the satisfaction which hope, led forward by memory, encourages us to indulge.

If we may so say, England is fairly entitled to welcome the projected marriage of the Prince of Wales with joyous anticipation. The blood of parents whose personal excellencies won the admiration of the world and the love of the British people mingles in his veins. A mature partaking, it may be presumed, of the genial elements distinguishing each of those from whose union it is derived, developed under the most watchful and conscientious care, cultivated with sagacious assiduity, and placed, from early childhood, in the best position for acquiring full information and for maturing high habits, can hardly be wouldly marted without experiencing that ennobling and elevating change which woman's influence is needed to produce on manly virtues. Happily, in this instance, Love kindled the fire of Hymen's torch. The nuptial alliance was not prescribed by diplomacy. Young hearts kissed each other and exchanged vows before national policy was consulted. We are the more interested in the marriage to which the nation is looking forward, and we have the greater satisfaction in it, because it will have come about in the natural way. If rumour speak truly, it was sisterly intuition which first discovered the qualities which became a bride's title, and sisterly affection which first brought them under the Prince's notice. At any rate, the choice is that of his own heart, and all the conditions deemed essential to exemplify the truth of the old adage that "marriages are made in Heaven," are present in this contract.

The judgment of the people of England ratifies in the affection of the Prince. Glad that true love has given him his bride, they are also glad that his bride, according to universal repute, is worthy of him. The Princess Alexandra, destined in all human probability to share with her husband elect the first throne of the world, is said by all who have had the opportunity of ascertaining the fact, to be richly endowed with all the qualities likely to retain as well as win the heart of the Prince and to shed lustre on the high position she will occupy among us. Natural disposition and suitable culture, associated with rare personal beauty and with—what is still more precious—beauty of soul, will find, we trust, in the contemplative sphere into which the Princess is about to be introduced, fitting as well as ample scope for display, exercise, and development. She will enter a Court which the presence of a widowed Queen and the memory of the deceased Consort combine to hallow as the safe abode of purity, and be welcomed to the home of the Swedish virtues, where duty receives the profoundest homage, and where to be and to do good is the surest way to honour. It is not necessarily so. It has not been always so. Feminine loveliness has not invariably, not even frequently, found the atmosphere of the Royal Family the most favourable for its flowering into fruit; and in the blaze of light which surrounds the neighbourhood of a throne the moral graces of woman do not always attain their highest vigour. But it is happily different in the Court of Queen Victoria. The most delicate virtue will thrive there as in congenial soil. The best influences which a loving but high-minded wife can diffuse around her, like the fragrance of violets, will meet with due appreciation there. The Princess will, no doubt, trustingly bring with her all that heightens her own worth, confident that it will live and flourish and exhale its sweetness in her adopted as in her native home.

The national importance of the marriage fixed for solemnisation in March next is not in the least diminished by the fact that the alliance has no direct political significance. The day has gone by in which England could borrow either additional splendour or strength from continental Thrones. The connections of the Court of St. James's might vainly into every Court of Europe without bringing to us an atom of increased influence, but not without imposing upon us weightier and more embarrassing responsibilities. It pleases us, in the present case, that the Danish people come from the same original stock as ourselves, and that our Prince and their Princess are as nearly allied in race as it is possible, perhaps, for members of different nations to be. But the marriage, nevertheless, promises important, although indirect, political advantages. The British Throne, it is true, is surrounded, and therefore limited, by popular institutions, but its influence is immense. Whether it occupant secures the willing homage or excites the vigilant suspicion, of the British people, is an alternative the decision of which determines also another and more momentous one—namely, whether political progress shall be smooth, easy, and uninterrupted, or whether it shall be marked by convulsive efforts and be attended in its course with turbulence and perhaps bloodshed. The early and suitable marriage of the Prince of Wales offers us a powerful guarantee of quiet and untroubled constitutional advance. Against all the temptations to political partisanship to which the position of the Prince may lay him open, his admirable training will be well seconded by the satisfied repose of his affections, by the sympathy of his wife in all that is enlightened, wise, and noble, by parental solicitudes, and by the cares of married life, which tend more than any other to ripen the character, and will best fortify him against their seductive influence. A happy marriage is the surest of all prophylactics against restlessness of spirit. It is the source of a blessing for which we have reason to be and we count it a blessing for which we have reason to be and we count it a blessing for which we have reason to be thankful that the Prince will exert its benign influence before the other has had time or opportunity to assail the Prince's mind.

These and many similar considerations will prompt all loyal Englishmen—and where are the Englishmen that are not loyal?—to rejoice in the marriage of the Prince of Wales as a most auspicious national event—one of the bright epochs in the history of their country. For the sake of her Most Gracious Majesty—for the sake of the young couple who will then plight their troth on the altar of religion—and for the sake of this realm, whose best interests are so closely identified with those of the Royal Family—the subjects of the British Throne will, one and all, be present in spirit at the forthcoming solemnity, and to the supplications which will then be offered for the Divine blessing on the nuptial union they will add their unanimous and devoutest "Amen." For the sake of the people, it will be a holiday; and we trust that, looking back upon it from the distance of twenty years hence, every subject in the kingdom will have as much reason to remember it with gratitude as he now feels bound to cherish when he calls to mind the auspicious wedding-day of the parent and the Prince of Wales's lamented father. That the married life of the youthful and Royal pair may resemble that of Victoria and Albert in everything but its too early and abrupt termination by death, will be, we are sure, the fervent desire and prayer which will ascend to Heaven from the altar of every heart in her Majesty's dominions.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Treaty of Commerce between France and Italy was signed on the 17th inst.

The new Prussian Ambassador to the Court of the Tuileries, Count Goltz, had a private audience of the Emperor on the 17th inst. to deliver his credentials. In reply to the friendly expressions of Count Goltz, in the name of his Government, the Emperor said that every thing in his power for the 22nd inst. publishes a report, signed by MM. Persigny and Rouher, which is followed by a decree of the Emperor appropriating the sum of five millions of francs to the Interior and Public Works. These credits are destined for the subvention of works of commercial utility, for the assistance of charitable institutions, and for the encouragement of works of an industrial character.

The distressed state of the labouring classes in France seems at length to have engaged the public attention. The Moniteur announces that, independently of the subscriptions opened for the workmen of the Seine Inférieure, the Emperor has contributed 100,000f. to be distributed among the different manufacturing towns.

The Moniteur publishes the official return of the receipts of the Treasury during the month of December, which amount to 1,103,637,000f.; being an increase of 91,120,000f. over the preceding year, and of 116,975,000f. over 1861.

The Budget of expenses for 1864 has just been laid before the French Chambers. The amount is, in round numbers, 1,778,000,000f. (£71,120,000).

It is stated that the Imperial Prince is to be placed next month under the care of a tutor.

M. Thouvenel has issued cards announcing that she will receive at the British Embassy on the evenings of the 28th and 31st of January, and the 7th, 14th, and 21st of February. There is not to be dancing.

Prince Joachim Napoleon Murat, chef d'escadron of the Guides, has been promoted to the rank of Officer of the Legion of Honour.

The Revue Nationale has received a first warning.

Mr. Mitchell, the new British Consul-General, assume his functions of Ambassador at London.

M. Thouvenel, it is said, has refused the offer made to him by the electors of Saint Jean d'Angély (Charente-Inférieure), to bring him forward as their candidate at the next election.

The Emperor has signed the Royal decree confirmed the judgment of the Tribunal of Commerce, which had condemned M. Mirès to pay to the liquidators of the Crédit Mobilier the sum of 2,500,000f. by way of provision.

Marshal Canrobert's marriage with Miss Flora Macdonald has been solemnised at the British Embassy, and also (the spouses being of different religions) at the chapel of the Senate.

The celebrated sculptor, Pradier, a member of the Institute and Grand Officer of the Legion of Honour, died on the 17th inst., at the apartments he occupied in the Palace of the Louvre, in the 57th year of seventy-four. He intend to give a portrait of M. Vacant in our next Number.] The funeral took place on the 19th, and a considerable number of the members of the Institute and the Academy of Fine Arts were present. The two young sons of the late Paul Delaroche, Vernet's son-in-law, were the chief mourners. The Emperor and the Duc de Morny were represented by two of his Chamberlains to attend the funeral.

The curiosity and competition of amateurs were keenly aroused during last month by the sale of a portion of the collection of paintings and objects of art and virtù belonging to Prince Anatole Demidoff, ex-husband of the Princess Mathilde. The entire collection realized the sum of £40,000.

The Théâtre Français and the Odéon celebrated on the 15th inst., the 241st anniversary of Molière's birthday. The former theatres played "Le Misanthrope" and "Le Malade Imaginaire"; and the latter "L'Ecole des Maris" "Le Malade Imaginaire," and a new piece called "La Fille de Molière."

The long-announced "Maestro de Portici" was revived at the Grand Opera, Paris, on the 19th inst. The house was crowded, and the representation of Auber's work was, it is stated, in the highest degree successful. The Temps says, "The enthusiasm with which the air 'Amour la Patrie' produced, as usual, an immense effect; it aroused the enthusiasm of the entire house, and the patriotic sentiment which filled the words the Confederates, during the night of the 3rd inst., to Sullabaun, thirty miles distant, on the line of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railway. The Federal General Rosencrans has occupied Murfreesboro', but was not able to pursue General Bragg's army, which retired in good order. The Federals acknowledge a loss of 4000 killed and 6000 wounded—of several thousand prisoners 2 pieces of artillery, 4 flags, 5 Williah and Rey are among the prisoners. The Confederate loss is estimated at 4500 killed and wounded and 1000 prisoners. Twenty-seven furnaces, supplied in the rear of the Federal army by the Confederate cavalry, were immediately shot by their captors.

Five thousand Federal cavalry have made a raid from Kentucky into East Tennessee, and destroyed nine miles of the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad, near Knoxville, thus preventing reinforcements from Richmond reaching General Bragg.

Despatches from General Grant to General Halleck report that General Sullivan defeated the Confederates under General Forrest, at Lexington, Tennessee, on the 1st inst., destroying six cannon and many prisoners. The Confederate loss in killed and wounded is put down at 1000 men, and that of the Federals at 800.

General Sherman invested Vicksburg, in the Lower Mississippi, with 40,000 men, Commodore Porter's gunboats co-operating with 40,000 men, Commodore Porter's gunboats co-operating with the fighting for two days, with varying success. The Federals fought their way to within two miles of the city, capturing three lines of rifle pits, some of which assailed by fresh troops assailed by General Joe Johnston. After a hand-to-hand fight, the Federals were driven back to their first line of defences, with the loss of General Morgan and 3000 men. The Confederates have concentrated their forces from Jackson and Grenada at Vicksburg.

The celebrated iron-clad, the Monitor, the first born of Mr. Ericsson's military genius, sprang a leak, while off Cape Hatteras, on the 31st, and sank. The Monitor was towed by the steamer Rhode Island, which succeeded in saving a portion of the officers and crew. Five officers and nineteen men belonging to the two vessels were lost. One hundred and fifty men were saved by the steamer Rescue.

At New Orleans General Banks had released 112 State prisoners sentenced to imprisonment. He had also issued an order permitting the clergy of New Orleans to resume their functions under certain restrictions.

A large proportion of the officers of the Kentucky regiments had sent in their resignations in consequence of the issue of Mr. Lincoln's latest proclamation. The volunteers from this State share the sentiments of their officers.

ASSEMBLY FUNDS.

General Halleck has rescinded the order of General Grant excluding all Jews from his department.

President Lincoln arrived at Washington, and dined with Mr. Seward. He was also the object of a popular manifestation in his favour at the National Hotel.

The Jacob Tome Institute, New York, was crowded on the 5th inst. to its fullest capacity by an audience of white and coloured people of both sexes, on the Emancipation Proclamation. Representatives of the European, African, and mulatto races occupied the platform. Speeches were made by the Rev. Dr. Cheever, Lewis Tappan, and the Rev. Dr. Denton, a white man; and by the Rev. H. H. Garnet, the Rev. J. S. Raymond, Professor W. J. Brown, the Rev. Mr. Pennington, and other coloured men of distinction.

The returns of the annual immigration at the port of New York show that the number of immigrants was 76,000, or 15,000 more than in 1861. The immigration exceeded the Irish in 1862. We are told from England follows third.

Owing chiefly to the astonishing and sudden development of the American grain trade with Europe, 1862 was a peculiarly favourable year to the transit business of railways and canals. The New York canals, which only earned 900,000 dols. as against 1,000,000 in 1858, paid over to the State which owns them 4,000,903 dols. in 1862. The principal item in the increase of receipts was the tolls on wheat, the former years of peace. Some of them, as the New York and Erie, and Illinois and Michigan Canals, have never paid, or long since ceased to pay, dividends, commenced to pay them in 1862.

Gold has risen to 36 per cent premium.

GOVERNOR SEYMOUR'S MESSAGE.

The message of Governor Horatio Seymour to the Governor of the State of New York was delivered to the Legislature on the 7th. He says, when commencing the subject of the war:—

The truths of the financial and military situation must be kept back. There must be no attempt to put down free expression of public opinion. Arraigned at the bar of the authors of our own race, and of mankind, North and South, insist that it was caused by an unavoidable contest about slavery. They say that the people of the Southern States revolted to fix the law for the country of the war in the prevailing disregard of obligations of law and constitutions, in defiance of public authority; shown still in the local prejudices which have grown up in the two portions of the Atlantic States at the two extremities of the country. There is no honourable record of any act which does not teach that our people must reform themselves as well as the conduct of the Government. Let us not hope that the end of the war is in sight, or that the country if we will cater upon our sacred duty in a right spirit and in the right way. Then the Union will be seen full of strength throughout the land and by the civilised world. We shall then strengthen the Government, which is the only hope of the people; and the world will see that we have ever capacity for self-government when we show that we are capable of self-reform.

The Governor condemns the exercise of martial power as destructive of the rights of the citizen, of the rational and legislative powers of the general Government. He declares the Emancipation Proclamation to be hostile, unjust, and unconstitutional; calculated to raise many barriers to the restoration of the Union; likely to be misconstrued by the world as an abandonment of the principles of liberty for which New York was ready to expend, and which will be effectually realized. The Union will be restored by the Generals and Statesmen of the North, who are opposed to secession, the violent passions which bear control at the extremes. Those central Slave States which have been compelled to secede, which have been forced into the Union, and which were driven away by a contemptuous and uncomprehending policy, remain. Besides, the Federal Constitution declares that the Union is indissoluble, and the rights of States must be respected as not less sacred. A consolidated Government would destroy the home rights and liberties of the people. The suppression of journals and the imprisonment of persons have been illegal and unwise.

The Governor contends that though the seceded States may have forfeited their rights of appeal to the Constitution, not a single right of the people of the loyal States can be suspended. He declares that the civil war in the South saves from the people of the loyal North the burden of taxation which would be the price of submission to the armies in the field, and obedience to all the constitutional demands of the Federal Government. Under no circumstances can the division of the Union be conceded.

INDIA.

The amount of news brought by the Bombay mail is not large. Affairs in Rajpootana remain unchanged. Sir Hugh Rose last thought it prudent to place a field force at the disposal of the political agent there. According to the last advices Dost Mohamed had resolved on investing Candahar. He had also issued an order for the cessation of peace made to him by Sultan Jan. Herat is provisioned for a year. A commercial treaty was concluded with the King of Ava by the Indian Government for the free passage through his territory of all merchandise to or from British Burmah or China.

CHINA.

We have news from Shanghai to the 6th of December. At that date the rebels had withdrawn from the neighbourhood of Shanghai, and commenced attacking the city. The Imperial troops were concentrating near Nankin, and were preparing to attack. It was reported that the Russian fleet had arrived, in order to co-operate with them. The Russian troops were also expected at Ningpo. The Imperialists had recaptured Shangyn from the rebels, and their cause was generally progressing.

According to the Weekly British Colonist, of Victoria, Vancouver Island, of the 4th of November, two steamers had just arrived there from New Westminster, with upwards of 200 passengers, and gold-dust to the value of a quarter of a million dollars.

During the present year the Moravians intend to celebrate the fifteenth anniversary of the introduction of Christianity into their country. Great preparations are to be made for the occasion, and visitors are expected to be present in large numbers from all the neighbouring countries—Bohemia, Galicia, Prussia, Hungary, Posen, and Russian Poland.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

The Bishop of London, on the 21st inst., held, at Fulham Palace, his customary half-yearly meeting of the Archdeacons and Rural Deans of the metropolitan diocese. The latter constitute the archdeaconry of London, subdivided by the present Bishop into seven rural or suburban deaneries; and the meeting consisted of the Archdeacon of London and the Bishop, with the rural or suburban deaneries. The Bishop afterwards received the Archdeacons and Rural Deans at luncheon.

A beautiful east window has been erected in the new chancel of Dalton Parish Church, Lancashire, by a memorial of the late Prince Consort, by Charles Boothby, Esq., and his wife, the Hon. Mrs. Boothby, whose late husband, Lord Brabazon, has a pew in the church. The window is of three lights. A painted glass window has been placed in the east end of Claydown Church, by Thomas Wroughton, Esq., in memory of his wife, Mrs. Wroughton, who died in June last. A beautiful painted glass east window has recently been erected in the parish church of Skegness, Wilts, by Charles Norris, Esq., in memory of his four brothers; and the interior of the church has been restored with much propriety and taste.

The second gathering of Metropolitan Church Choirs will take place at St. Faux, Walworth, on the 26th inst.

The Rev. Father Damien, of Honolulu, states that Bishop Staley has already preached in Hawaiid. Though the pronunciation was far from correct, the natives could understand most of the sermon. The chapel was crowded to excess. Many could not get in.

The Lyttelton Times says that active measures are being taken for the formation of the Canterbury College in connection with Canterbury, and diocese of Christchurch, New Zealand. Mr. Scott furnishes the plans, and there is about £6000 in hand.

On the 12th inst. the clergy of the rural deanery of Chesterfield (twenty in number), headed by the Ven. Archdeacon Hill, met at Sheffield Castle, and presented a testimonial to Rural Dean Bury, Rector of Eckington, for the purpose of presenting him with a token of their sense of his services in the cause of education, and his hospitality and kindness to them at his house during the period of at least fifteen years. The testimonial consisted of a plentifully-furnished tea-service, which Mr. Bury duly acknowledged.

A meeting in connection with the Church was held on the 19th inst. at the Townhall of Brentford—the Bishop of London in the chair. The Bishop briefly stated the objects of the meeting, which were to ask co-operation with the clergy in carrying out parochial work, and an organisation for the purpose of more perfect union. He then called upon Mr. Burch Beresford to address the meeting. The meeting was held in connection with this diocesan Church Union, which has been in active and successful working order. The meeting was addressed by the Bishop, Mr. Walpole, M.P., Mr. Hailstone, Mr. Burch Beresford, and the Rev. Sackville Lawrence.

After service at the English Church at Lyons on New-Year's Day, the congregation presented a handsome testimonial to the Rev. James Charles Gaussen, a testimonial of their respect and affection, and of their gratitude for his zeal and devotedness in the discharge of his pastoral duties, and threatened to deprive them altogether of his services. The testimonial consisted of a silver tea-service, and a purse of 1000 francs.

COUNTRY NEWS.

The Mayor of Cardiff gave a ball on Twelfth Night at the Townhall to the juvenile members of the leading families of the town.

George Banks has been sentenced to six months' hard labour for having the poor-box at Ambleside Church.

The Scotsman announces the death, in his 87th year, of Sir Duncan Dundas, Bart., of Fingland and Culnet.

Mr. Westhead was cordially received by his constituents at York on the 11th inst., when he addressed them on the topics of the day.

Punishment in the stocks was inflicted on drunkards at Andover, Hants. The grim apparatus of former days has twice recently been in active use.

Mr. George Denman contradicts the statement that, having received a Government appointment, he is about to retire from the representation of Tiverton.

Robberies with violence are reported in alarming profusion. One is recorded from Bradford, and three in Manchester. In one of the cases in Manchester an individual was robbed of more than £200 and severely injured by a gang of ruffians.

The annual show of poultry and pigeons was opened at Liverpool on the 21st inst. in Lucas's Rooms, which were better filled than on any previous occasion of the kind. There were 460 pens, and the general display, particularly of game birds, was above the average of previous years.

Captain Douglas, of the barque Veronica, has been presented by the Liverpool Local Marine Board with a valuable telescope (the gift of the Board of Trade), in acknowledgment of his humane and gallant rescue of twenty-eight men, the captain and crew of the Nepaul, which foul vessel was in a sinking condition off Cape Recife.

The foundation-stone of new Exchange Buildings for Birmingham was laid on the 19th inst. by H. Van Wart, Esq., chairman of the company, in the presence of a large number of spectators. The Exchange is to be 240 feet long, 120 feet wide, and lighted by a range of large arches and lofty unvarried windows.

A great meeting was held at the Mansion House, Dublin, on the 20th inst., when resolutions were passed declaring that the Government was "imperatively called upon" to relieve the Galway Company from their present difficulties. The Marquis of Clanricarde, Lord Castlerosse, Lord Dunsandle, and several members of the House of Commons addressed the meeting.

A new company was created last week. Aintree racecourse on the 19th inst., by a race between an elephant of Mr. Bell's hippodrome, some adults and juvenile runners, and a number of donkeys. The elephant won the race, and so great that it was quite impossible to obtain a clear course, and, a fair start. The donkeys were much upset by the race way they were driven, being obstinate. All bets were therefore declared off. The elephant can run very well.

The annual soirée of the Bromsgrove Literary and Mechanics' Institute, the first that has been held since the amalgamation of the two societies, took place, on the 19th instant, in the large room of the Corn Exchange, which was decorated with evergreens and banners for the occasion. About 300 persons of both sexes sat down at five o'clock, and at the conclusion of the tea-drinking Mr. Cookson addressed the meeting at some length.

At a "conference" held at Liverpool on the 17th inst. a resolution was carried by "a large majority" expressing approval of the emancipation policy of President Lincoln, and a committee was appointed to carry out a scheme of "friendly intervention" on behalf of the United States of the American question," by means of lectures and public discussions. All this is to be done in perfectly parliamentary and general aggregate style, and despite of an address to President Lincoln.

A labouring man named Neame has been convicted by the County Justices of having been found in Covert Wood, in the parish of Ash, Kent, and sentenced to be Antichrist, with hard labour, for a month. The Bench restricted the man to be imprisoned, with hard labour, for a period of six weeks, and at the end of that time to find sureties for his good behaviour again for one year; in default, to be further imprisoned for a term of six calendar months.

A series of accidents which have taken place at the Ince Collieries, near Wigan, show the peculiar dangers to which miners are liable. On the 20th inst. a man was killed at the Ince Hall Coal Company's pit by the fall of a part of the roof; on the 17th a banksman was crushed at Messrs. Rimmell's Ince pit between the cage and the pit-head; and on the following day; and on the 20th two men employed at Rose Bridge Colliery were killed by a fall of rubbish.

The wife of R.W. Blencowe, Esq., of the Hook, Challey (father of Mr. J. G. Blencowe, M.P. for Lewes), has been presented with a handsome testimonial, the gift of the tradesmen, nobility, and gentlemen generally of Sussex, who subscribed upwards of £400 for the purpose. The testimonial consisted of a silver tea-service, by Mr. Edward Barnard, of the Watson London, of Edinburgh. The occasion of the presentation was the retirement of Mr. Blencowe from the chairmanship of Quarter Sessions for the Eastern Division of Sussex, which office he has held for twenty-five years. The presentation took place at Lewes on the 20th inst., Mr. Blencowe in the portrait being presented by the Earl of Chichester, Lord Lieutenant of the county.

A strange accident happened at the High Brook Colliery, Wigan, on the morning of the 15th inst. The crank end of the piston of the 30-inch brick and engine suddenly broke off, and the fragments flew in all directions, and boys in it at the time who were thus imprisoned. A window was fitted up and provisions, beds, and other necessaries supplied to them, and there they remained until they could be relieved. Great efforts were at the same time made to have the engine repaired, and it was accomplished in time to work the pit on the following day, at noon, the men and boys were all brought to the surface little the worse for their imprisonment. The accident occurred at the bottom of the pit, or parts, on reaching the surface, sang the Old Hundredth Psalm.

The High Court of Justiciary of Edinburgh has given judgment in the case of the Rev. Mr. M'Laughlin, of Glasgow, who was sent to prison for a month for refusing to give evidence in respect to what had been told to him as a priest, but not in confession. The Court held that he had been guilty of contempt of Court, and that the sentence on him was a proper one. Lord Justice-Clerk, however, intimated that if the witness having been led into some confusion as to his obligation by the concession of the Court, he would be willing to receive from the witness a statement of the conduct he had committed, resolved to mitigate the sentence to the term of imprisonment already suffered, and to remove the other conditions attached to it.

Several complaints having recently been made of the ineffectual lights at the entrance to the coast of Wirral, Cheshire, particularly between New Brighton and Rephaka, a meeting was held at the Townhall, Birkenhead, on the 14th inst., in order to arrange for the naming and launch of a new life boat, the gift of the National Lifeboat Institution. It was resolved to call the lifeboat The Rescue, and that the launch should take place at Seacombe on the 24th inst. The Rescue is a boat 34 feet long by 8 feet 6 inches broad, with twelve oars, 31 in diameter, 8ft. space between, making altogether a total length of 34 feet. Local subscriptions and subscriptions to the amount of £100 were announced.

Mr. Miner Gibson addressed a meeting of his constituents at Ashton-under-Lyne on the 21st inst. The distress in Lancashire, the American War, and the present condition of the country were the subjects touched upon by the right hon. gentleman in the course of his speech. With regard to America, he said that the policy was a wise one, and he maintained that the secession of the South took place on the question of slavery. He objected to the policy of Mr. Lincoln regarding them for the Negro Slave Law would not be carried out. He dwelt at some length upon the results of our recent commercial treaty with France, the consequences of the repeal of taxes, the war in America, and the calamity which has overtaken the cotton districts, and concluded by saying that "as matters now stand" so much for Mr. Gladstone's estimates are likely to be more than fulfilled. A vote of confidence in Mr. Gibson was then unanimously passed.

The operatives employed by Mr. John Whittaker, of Higher Hurst, near Ashton-under-Lyne, have recently expressed their gratitude, in a very tasteful manner, for the liberal way in which he has dealt with them in recent crisis. When it was found necessary to stop the mill there were 1000 hands employed, and the question was how to fill up their time usefully. From the beginning of October last until the 19th of the present month Mr. Whittaker had expended £2000 in payments to those who made cooperative schools and sewing classes, besides direct assistance in food and clothing, which has been given to the sick and aged. The workpeople, in testifying their feelings which this help aroused, and accordingly they set forth their case in a very concert, became unanimous in their determination to have a grand concert. They had it copied into a handsome book, illuminated, with all the names appended, and they presented it to him in the course of a few days back.

A fire occurred on the premises of Messrs. London and Boston Hurst, Birmingham, one of the largest drapery establishments in the town, on the night of the 16th inst., and it was completely destroyed.—The Ashton Hotel, one of the principal inns in Jury, Lancashire, was burned down on the morning of the 18th inst. One poor fellow (the "hostler") was burnt to death. Some of the other inmates had a narrow escape.—On the morning of the 18th inst. a fire occurred at the White Hart, one of the oldest inns in Rugby. The premises were gutted, and the inmates narrowly escaped being burned to death.—A fire, attended with the destruction of considerable property, occurred at Gloucester on Sunday, in the Westgate four-mill, a building four stories high, containing four pairs of stones, and occupied by Messrs. Reynolds and Allen.—Some of the premises of Messrs. Hall and Peters, E. Lees and Sons, Bridge End Ironworks, Ashton-under-Lyne, on the 21st inst., which totally destroyed the workshops.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, JANUARY 24, 1863.

WHATEVER may be the strategic value of the recent operations in America, there can be no doubt that they will have moral weight, and we could almost wish that the success of the Federals had been more marked, inasmuch as there might then be more hope of their being brought to relinquish a useless and hopeless war. It might be too much to expect that a high-spirited people, accustomed to vaunt its superiority over Creation generally, would be inclined to listen to any terms for pacification while four unmistakable defeats were unbalanced by any proof that the enemy was in a similar plight. We believe that nearly all, except professional politicians and others, whose profits lie in the continuance of the struggle, have ceased to speak of the reconstruction of the Union as one of the objects of the war, we have no right to blame the dogged obstinacy with which the Federals insist on going on with the struggle, till a fair opportunity for a decisive "rest in the accounts." Nobody likes to be completely defeated, and many a man who has privately made up his mind that he is so will cling to his adversary, and struggle, and wrangle, rather than accept the situation. A small success will often serve him as an excuse for retiring, flushed and angry, and declaring that he should have gained the day but for a chain of accidents which took the strife out of the lists of fair play. We have no right to expect the Americans to rise superior to human nature; nobody but themselves ever supposed them at such a moral altitude, and Englishmen have been ready to make every allowance for exacerbated and discomfited men. But this Murfreesboro' business, although we lack accurate details of it, has shown that the Federals, if decently led, can fight as well as their antagonists, and can almost gain a victory. The battle was protracted and sanguinary; but, let the Confederates make the very best of it, they had to abandon the field. The affair must count on the Federal side; and we repeat that we are inclined to hope that this will be placed beyond dispute by the despatches, because mediation might then address itself to the victors with a good chance of being listened to with something more than tolerance. We should like to be able to say to the North that it had at length vindicated its military character, and might now be expected to show that it was governed by reason, and was prepared to abandon an attempt at impossible coercion.

We do not for a moment contend that the time has come for England to say this. Our Government may or may not be more inclined than heretofore to reconsider the situation, but it is impossible to say, just now, what our Government thinks. Mr. Gladstone has said his say upon the American question, and believes that the South is a nation; while his colleague, Mr. Milner Gibson, assures his constituents that the North is winning, because it occupies more territory than it did in the earlier stage of secession. We may hear a third voice, of more potency, in the course of these remarks; but, on the whole, it would seem that the Premier does not believe that the time has come for any general European demonstration against the continuance of the war.

But we must call attention to another phase of the question. It is one which the journalist has watched for some time past, and it is creditable to the reticence and discretion of the British press that no irritating use has been made of the facts. There can, however, be no object now in disguising the truth, which is, that France has become an object of both dislike and apprehension on the part of the Federals. It is not many months since such a state of things would have seemed impossible. It had come to be the habit with the Americans to speak of the French as the most advanced nation of the Old World, to heap adulation upon the wisdom of the Emperor Napoleon, and to profess a sort of belief that one day France and the Republic might, in union, direct the destinies of the world. It is not now worth inquiring how far these sentiments were shared by what Sir Philip Francis calls the only excuse for flattery—namely, the odium tertii. Whether England was the third party who was so hateful that it was pleasant to flatter her supposed enemy, is now beside the question. The case was so, and the change has had a right to believe that his influence was very powerful in the North. It is gone, and the Emperor knows that it is gone, and does not trouble himself to disguise that knowledge. The journals of the North have for some time been full of taunts and sneers at the Tuileries, and these expressions of feeling have lately deepened into downright abuse, and violence. The Emperor is told that he is "found out," and is warned that it is not for a despot (the discovery of whose despotism is curiously coincident with the establishment of another) to interfere with the will of a great and free nation. He is told that his attempt at democracy has led into a joint melodrama as an "exoderm," and England herself is actually praised for having been too "deep" for the Sphinx of Paris. He is further assured that, should he presume to interfere further, and especially should he give the slightest sign of using other than moral force, he will be speedily confronted by a tremendous coalition. As the constituents of this coalition might not be easily guessed, we had better say that it is to consist of Russia, England, Spain, and the Federals, and that it is to replace upon the throne of France the house whose Princes fought so nobly for Republican institutions. We are simply reproducing the language of various Northern papers, and those who are unfortunately obliged to peruse such publications will testify to the accuracy of our statements.

The Emperor of the French does not appear to be very much terrified by this fearful programme, or, if he is, he continues to practise the art of waiting his chance, and appears to treat mediation as a thing to be attempted again as soon as opportunity shall serve; but, without insisting too much upon this, he orders the publication of a document in which he distinctly enunciates his intention of opposing the force of right to what is not very properly called the right of doctrine. The despatch to General Forey is about as significant a document as need be, and it lays down as part of the Imperial policy a resolve to repress American ascendency in America. And, as Sir Walter Scott says of another Louis of France, "he is just the man to carry a long plan of ambition out by following it up by an execution." The Mexican expedition, largely reinforced, is going to work in thorough earnest: the capital is to be seized at all cost; and perhaps the occupation of Rome may be paralleled by an occupation of Mexico that will "protect" the throne of the Hapsburgs from rumours, especially such as come from any part of the American Continent. The gauntlet is fairly flung to all who cry "America for the Americans;" and it may be an additional reason against an attempt to reconstitute the Union that the first step of the new State must in honour be an armed protest against French and Spanish the swagger of twenty years is even more vain than it was believed to be.

In noting the history of the war, therefore, we may observe that it has called into existence a new element of opposition to the extension of American "Empire;" and, although at the present moment this may not seem so important a fact as it is, the fact will be a very grave one when the time comes, as come it must, for settling by treaty the principle of the Partition of America. Into how many portions the vast continent will be divided it is now impossible to say, but it is quite clear that France proposes to erect barriers against the unity of the continent.

Her Majesty the Queen has forwarded £200 for the relief of the distress in North Warwickshire and Coventry, to be divided between the two existing funds. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has sent £200, to be applied in a similar manner.

THE OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.—Mr. Disraeli has issued a circular to the Conservative members of the House of Commons requesting their attendance on the opening of Parliament, "as business of importance will probably be brought forward."—This summons of the Opposition leader in the Lower House to his followers has been promptly followed by a circular from Lord Palmerston to the Ministerial supporters conveying a similar request.

THE COURT.

The Queen continues in the enjoyment of good health at Osborne. Her Majesty has taken daily exercise during the week, generally accompanied by the Princesses.

On the 18th inst. the Queen, with Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, Princess Helena, Prince Frederick Louis, and Prince Leopold, attended Divine service at Osborne. The Bishop of Worcester, who had arrived on a visit on the previous day, officiated.

On the 19th inst. Prince Louis of Hesse left Osborne for Sandringham Hall, Norfolk, on a visit to the Prince of Wales. His Royal Highness joined the Right Hon. Benjamin Disraeli, and visited the Haymarket Theatre.

It is understood that the contract of marriage between the Prince of Wales and Princess Alexandra of Denmark has been exchanged at Copenhagen, and that the marriage will take place in the month of March.

THE PRINCE OF WALES.

The Prince of Wales has been enjoying the sport of shooting over his estates in Norfolk, to considerable extent during the past week. On the 19th inst. Prince Louis of Hesse arrived at Sandringham, travelling by the Great Eastern Railway to the Woolleton station, and there met one of the Prince's carriages to the hall.

At a special meeting of the members of the Royal Institution of Great Britain on the 19th inst. the Royal Highness the Prince of Wales was proposed and unanimously elected honorary member and vice-patron of the Royal Institution.

The Earl of Derby has issued invitations for a Parliamentary dinner, on the 4th of next month, to a large circle of peers, his political supporters in the House of Commons. The Right Hon. Benjamin Disraeli, it is issued cards for a Parliamentary dinner, on the same day, at his residence, Grosvenor-gate.

Arrangements have been made for displaying the designs prepared by the artists who competed for the new Exchange to be erected in St. George's Hall, Windsor Castle, to be ready for her Majesty's inspection in her private apartments.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and Princess Mary have returned to Cambridge Cottage, from a week's visit with their Majesties at Osborne House, Isle of Wight.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess d'Aumale have arrived at Orleans House, Twickenham, from a tour of visits.

His Excellency Baron de Gerolt has been newly accredited Ambassador from the Court of the Tuileries at St. James's, arrived at Albert-gate House on the 21st inst. from Paris.

His Excellency the Belgian Minister has taken a mansion in Grosvenor-square for a term of years.

The Countess of Flanders, Princess Victor of Hohenlohe) gave birth to a son, at his Serene Highness's residence in St. James's Palace, on Thursday night. The mother and infant are progressing well.

Earl Granville, K.G., Lord Privy Seal, gave a dinner on Friday, the 9th inst., at his residence in Bruton-street, to the Ministers and Officers of State to settle the roll of Sheriffs for the present year.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Mr. Richard Green, the eminent shipowner and shipbuilder, died on the 19th inst.

The experience of the first week's working of the Metropolitan Railway has been highly satisfactory. The number of passengers who travelled to and fro was 26,000, and the receipts £1,000.

Mr. A. K. Isbister, M.A., read a paper, on the 21st inst., at the meeting of the Society of Arts, "On the Hudson's Bay Territories as a Penal Settlement." He strongly advocated the adoption of such a scheme.

A juvenile ball was given on the 21st inst. at the Mansion House by the Lord Mayor. It was an extremely brilliant assemblage, and the number present was about 1200. Conjuring and other amusements were provided, and the supper was of the most recherché.

The half-yearly meeting of the shareholders of the London and Westminster Bank took place on the 21st inst. The directors declared a dividend and bonus at the rate of 12 per cent for the half year, or 24 per annum. The deposits of the bank amount to nearly £14,000,000.

It is understood that Mr. Locke, M.P., when next the Committee of the schools still proposed. Addresses were delivered by the Revs. R. Bushell, C. Morley, Salaam, and Hall.

An iron paddle-wheel steamer was launched on the 20th inst. in the Thames Ironworks, for the passage trade of Princess Alexandra. The steamer is about 600 tons, and has been built for the Messrs. Lee, of Dover House, Lambeth. She is to be employed for the service of the light-ships and lighthouses in the Thames, and will be ready for sea in the course of March.

The births of 1931 children—994 boys and 947 girls—were registered last week in the districts of the Metropolis, which contain a population of 1,863,42 the average number (corrected) was 1034.—The deaths in London in the week that ended on Saturday were 1,149. The average number of deaths in the corresponding weeks of the ten years 1853-62 is, with a correction for increase of population, 1415.

During the latter part of last week the private library and personal effects of the late Mott Rev, John Bird Sumner, D.D., Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, at his residence, No. 1, Lambeth-palace, Surrey, were disposed of by Messrs. Foster, by direction of the executors. Although the late Prelate was advanced in age he was well attended to his literary interests. The whole realized upwards of £1575.

The Metropolitan Board of Works have resolved, by a majority of 38 votes to 1, that the resolution of 1858, for erecting dockstoring sheds on the Victoria Embankment, be rescinded. The engineer is to report on the best way of conveying the sewage of the western districts to the outfall works at Barking. The house will thus be freed from one cause of impurity with which it was threatened.

On the 20th inst. the annual examination of the children belonging to the Ragged School Union in the presence of a numerous and large number of friends of education. The examination was most satisfactory in every respect, and of a most searching character, the examiners being persons unconnected with the school. A magnificent Christmas tree was exhibited, containing upwards of 1000 articles of clothing (given by the ladies of Lincolnsinn), from which every child in the school received a prize.

A pleasant recognition of valuable services was made on the 19th inst. in the Guildhall, when a number of gentlemen who had been associated in the movement to obtain a repeal of the taxes on knowledge met for the purpose of presenting a testimonial to Mr. John Cassell. More than three thirteen years had worked in connection with the Press Association to get the taxes off our newspapers, 1415, Mr. Cassell received the testimonial, which was a handsome silver salver and tea and coffee services, appropriately inscribed.

Some trials were made on the 19th inst. in the Regent's Canal dock with a model of the life-boat, 35ft. long, belonging to the National Life-boat Institution. Her qualities were severely tested, and although she proved herself a good boat in every way satisfactory. The test is called the Thames Champion, after the late president of the society, the celebrated Mr. Joseph Chapman; long and valuable services to the Life-boat Institution. She is intended for rowing, on the Sussex coast, in lieu of a smaller lifeboat at present on the station.

The Hon. Lord Mayor, Mr. W. Cubitt, M.P., formally communicated the resignation of his aldermanic gown to the Court of Aldermen on the 20th inst. Twenty-seven years and a-half of continuous office filled by the hon. gentleman as necessitating this important step. Mr. Alderman Humphery spoke in complimentary terms of the services of Mr. Cubitt both in Parliament and in the Corporation, and moved that the resignation be not accepted. This motion was seconded by Mr. Alderman Copeland, but was lost upon a show of hands. The resignation was then duly accepted, and a precept ordered to issue for the election of a successor to the hon. gentleman as alderman for the ward of Langbourn.

A deputation from the London Emancipation Society has presented a resolution to the American Minister approving of Mr. Lincoln's policy. His Excellency, in reply, said he was very much encouraged by the resolutions of the day. The movement in favour of the principles of human emancipation that has heretofore prevailed of the principles involved in the struggle," and he thought an increasing conviction on the other side of the Atlantic, that England was true to the principle of human freedom, "would have the effect in America of restoring those amicable relations and reviving those warm sentiments which ought to be entertained between the two kindred peoples at all times."

The members for Marylebone met their constituents on the 21st inst. Lord Fermoy said he had given Lord Palmerston a general but qualified support, because he believed him to be the best possible Minister under present circumstances, and decidedly to be preferred to Lord Derby. Referring to the measures of the last Session, Lord Fermoy said he deplored the Poaching Act. The war in America he hoped would soon end. He denied that republican institutions had had anything to do with the war, and said that if monarchical institutions had been introduced into America the States would not have had recourse to the ballot box. Mr. Harvey Lewis expressed similar opinions generally. A vote of confidence in the two hon. gentlemen was passed at the close of the meeting.

There was a large attendance of members of the Statistical Society, on the 19th inst., to hear an important paper read by Lieut Levi, R.N., On the Cotton Trade and Manufactures, as affected by the War in America. Professor Levi went into the subject at great length, and showed how vast and how varied were the resources of the cotton manufacture in this country. After pointing out the effects of the American War on this part of our trade, he concluded by observing that unless the American ports were suddenly thrown open there would not be sufficient cotton in the country to give the operatives more than eight weeks' work during the ensuing year. In the course of the discussion which followed Signor De Viveanzi, the Italian commissioner to the Exhibition, said cotton could be grown in Italy for 6d. per lb.

The children belonging to Christ Church Schools, St. George's-in-the-East, to the number of nearly 1000, were entertained with their annual Christmas feast on the 16th inst., under the direction of the incumbent, the Rev. G. H. M'Gill. A plentiful supply of tea, bread and butter, and plum cake was provided by the ladies and gentlemen connected with the schools, including the Marquis of Westminster, the Duchess Lady Wenlock, and the Hon. Miss Victoria Wenlock. The magic lantern contributed to the amusement of the most deserving scholars in the movement; and a handsome dressing-case was presented to Mr. Duke, the senior assistant master, as an acknowledgment of his indefatigable services during the past year.

A general meeting of the Royal Asiatic Society was held on the 19th inst.—Lord Strangford, president, in the chair. Mr. A. M. Bowlnes and Mr. Commissary Macleod were elected non-resident members. A substance of a paper was given by Mr. Spottiswoode, F.R.S., on the Indus astronomical temple. Mr. Fergusson, F.R.S., subsequently read a paper on the difference in conception between the Hindoo and Greek epicycles that are made to regulate the motions of the planets in the two systems. Professor Goldstücker then read a paper in which he established, by means of the actual application of certain rules of Sanskrit grammar, the true Sanskrit spelling of Kâtyâyana, that these two commentators of Pânini were contemporaries of the first grammatical writer, and not Kâtyâyana and Patanjali lived, as about A.D. 120, and he now mentioned that the two commentators made their home a long posterior to Pânini's time.

A meeting of the governors of St. Thomas's Hospital was held on the 20th inst., for the purpose of receiving a report from the grand committee relative to the removal of the hospital, which has taken during the last few months engaged much public attention. The report submitted stated at some length the various sites which had been brought under the notice of by the grand committee—namely, Bethlehem Hospital; the Flamingoes' land, Walworth; Bryanston-square; Hyde Park; the Queen Victoria Quarry; Slyatt's brewery ground, Camberwell New-road; and the Lambeth Thames Embankment, opposite the Houses of Parliament. Mr. Tite, M.P., then rose to move that the report be received, and that the several sites be referred back to the grand committee for their further consideration, and with power to receive additional information. After considerable discussion, Mr. Tite's motion was unanimously carried.

A numerous and influential meeting of gentlemen interested in the property of British Columbia was held on the 21st inst. at the London Tavern—the Hon. Alexander Morris, M.P., in the chair. Mr. Cox, a member of the Legislative Council of Canada, and delegate from British Columbia, addressed the meeting at considerable length on the resources, position, and prospects of the colony, and the importance of a line of intercommunication between the colonies of Canada and British Columbia, and the establishment of their saiders on the Pacific. He insisted on the practicability of the route through the Canadian territories, and was followed by Captain Grey, Mr. M'Lure, from Vancouver Island, enforced the same point, and explained that the reason why so many discontented left the Fraser River to the mines in the interest of roads through the colony and the famine price of provisions. He spoke also of the settlement on Vancouver Island. Mr. Mackenzie, as a provision of most interest, in which several gentlemen took part, a resolution was agreed to recommending the establishment of intercommunication from one to the west as a necessity of the times.

LAW AND POLICE.—A case of some importance to physicians came before the Second Court of Exchequer on the 20th inst. A physician, brought an action to recover £20,000, which he alleged had been promised to him by Mrs. Brown, the widow of a patient. Mrs. Brown's solicitor and her advocate in the famous Swinfen estate cause. At the trial a verdict was given for the plaintiff, subject to a motion to enter a nonsuit. In Court since neither a barrister could receive his fees by an action at law. Lord Chief Justice Erle pronounced the decision of the Court, that counsel could not maintain an action for litigation, and ordered the verdict to be entered for the defendants.

A question of considerable interest was lately before the Master of the Rolls. The late Lord Canning directed by his will that his property should be converted into money. The executors, on coming to examine it was found that several valuable manuscripts and other articles were in the possession of the deceased which had been in the possession of his father, the Right Hon. George Canning, were comprised in it, and the question came to be whether they were to be considered as heirlooms, or were to be disposed abroad along with other articles of property. The Master of the Rolls directed an inquiry among gentlemen versed in the writings of the time to be beneficial that the Canning relics should be dispersed along with other and manner articles.

A cold-blooded murder was committed at Acton on the night of the 19th inst. A gentleman named Bowles, who was out of work, was returning to his door by a man, who instantly discharged a gun at his head, killing him on the spot. The murderer is supposed to be a Mr. Charles Cornwallis Bowles—whom the constable had interrupted the same evening with some property they are alleged to have stolen. The two men are in custody.

Mr. Grove, the young medical student who so opportunely secured her Royal Highness the Princess of Hesse when she was thrown from her carriage in the Isle of Wight a few months since, has been presented with a valuable gold pin and a set of shirt studs.

The second Court ball of the season took place on the 14th inst., and was most animated, the Duchess de Brabant and the Comte de Flandres again doing the honours. A large number of state costumes were present, and the Comte danced during a greater part of the evening.

A batch of new Peers is to be created, it is rumoured. The noble expectants are Colonel Taylor, of Chalfont, Bucks, who is a staunch supporter of the Whigs in Ireland; Mr. Edward Ellice, Sir Charles Lyell, Mr. Hamilton Miller, and Mr. Wentworth Beaumont. It is said that two Earls will be promoted to be Marquisses. The Globe, however, says there is no "ministerial knowledge" of the matter.

The Queen has approved of Count Filippo Mancini as Consul at Nice, and Mr. Cave Tyne, of Bordeaux, as Consul at Cardiff, and of Mr. Giacome Sigo as Consul at Bombay, in the room of Mr. Hippolyte Lemire as Consul-General in France for the King of Madagascar; of Mr. M. B. Sampson as Consul-General in England, of Mr. Alfred Chapuis as Consul for the Republic of Nicaragua, at Hull, as Consul at Hull, for the Argentine Confederation; and of Mr. Thomas Ensall as Vice-Consul at Lowestoft for the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz.

THE DISTRESS IN THE NEIGHBOURHOOD OF LONDON.—Lord Shaftesbury writes to us on this subject that the number of applications, so far as money is concerned, are amply provided for. "Within a few miles from the centre of many of your readers there are in London tens of thousands in the deepest distress. The reports of the Bible women to the superintendent of the London Female Domestic Mission Society, which I have before me, since this year than usual, while a large portion of the money which went to supply the wants of the poor is diverted to keeping off fainting and even of death from starvation have been reported. The testimony of the clergy and of the various societies is all unanimous that the privations of the poor are now unusually severe, and, in one respect, they are worse off than Lancashire—in having no one central organised plan of relief. Some individuals have most considerately bought large parcels of clothing here for distribution among the London poor. This, when not specially superintended, has been sent to the superintendent of the London Female Domestic Missions for distribution among 176 districts, where it is sold at half-price to the poor, and the money thus obtained is applied to the work fund in each district. It thus braves doubly productive, and is one of the most effectual methods instead of checking the exertions of the poor themselves, who thus are preserved from the pauperising effect of what is often mischief charity."

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

HORACE VERNET is dead. Some weeks have elapsed since our Echoes recorded that the great French battle-painter was en retraite; and now the salons on the Quai Malaquais and the studio at Versailles are vacant. A man of great genius, of indefatigable industry, of chivalric honour and unblemished purity of life, is lost to France. Although he had been for more than half a century a European celebrity and the friend and companion of Kings, Horace Vernet was essentially modest and unassuming. His first Cross of the Legion of Honour was received from the hands of Napoleon I., his last from Napoleon III.; and every notedness he mentioned in the Almanach de Gotha was eager to shower decorations and diamonds upon him; but he refused a peerage from Louis Philippe, and the extreme simplicity with which the funeral obsequies were conducted was due to the earnestly-expressed wish of the dying artist that no decoration should adorn his coffin. The wish of the dying artist has to be respected even by the grave, and that no diamonds should be pronounced over his grave, and that no high functionaries should be his pall-bearers. A select circle of friends, among whom Edouard Vaillant and Count de Nieuwerkerke were prominent, were alone privileged to escort his remains to the grave, and the chief mourners were the two young sons of his friend and brother-artist, Paul Delaroche, who had married Horace's daughter.

So died, in peace, competence, and honour, a man whose name will be inscribed in endearing character on the tablet of Fame, but which will find no place in any future "Dictionnaire des Girouettes." In person Vernet was a vieux de la vieille, and, with the exception of the festivity of Napoleon at St. Helena, which was amusingly characteristic of the Anglophobia of the Emperor, he never figured in the behind of the Imperial and hungry-looking hyena, whose head was made, with very little pictorial distortion, to present the semblance of the whiskered and not very lovely countenance of his friend Jerome, "Plon-Plon Sir Hudson! What a métier de chien was his! A cross-tempered, edgety man is a man whose naturally angular temper is rubbed and worn round with the wear and tear of that terrible caged lion up at Longwood, Jonder.

An obliging French correspondent, who was recently good enough to correct an error into which we had fallen respecting the oak in the Palais Royal, of which the ceiling is supported, has sent us a pretty bird, tale as an anecdote eminently illustrative of the precocious ingenuity and facility of Horace. He was drawing a horse, on which also Louis Philippe, as his chief instructor, was giving him valuable criticism, "Legs too long!" and left the room. On his return he found that Horace had modified to his heart's content the legs of the quiet equine subject of representing the animal as standing in a good had, allowing for the reflection, disguised the untue elongation of the supporters.

Talking of the effacing process, we really must devote a line to the last clever, wicked thing said of Mr. Fechter, the manager of the Lyceum, but which, owing to an actress more distinguished for her talents than for her beauty, the witty, cruel, journalist remarked, "That woman is the first that one always sees behind the scenes and the piece of indurkber to rub her face out when one meets her!"

And so the Great Eastern Monitor has come to the last! Two months have passed since the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS contained an Engraving of the momentous fight in Hampton Reads, depicting both the Merrimac and the Monitor—the ill-fated Merrimac, the ill-omitted suicide; but the Monitor was the victim of suicide too. An ingenious puppy overtook her off Cape Hatteras; she sprang a leak; pumps were in vain; she became waterlogged, and went down like a stone. We are reminded of the warrior clad in Mambrino's helm as a Quixcidrio tells us, in one of the Italian civil wars of the middle ages, was ingulfed, hero, iron panoply and all, in the waters of the Lake Lucrino, by a man who had only had one day in the particular battle in question. There was an English Earl of Sandwich, too, Admiral and General at Sea, who, wearing in a sea fight his full naval engagement, was drowned by the weight of his armour.

Old tars of the Benbow school, nay, old landlubbers readers of Dibdin's songs, and believers in the sole efficacy of woolen walls, will doubtless rub their hands and chuckle at the catastrophes which have overtaken the steel-clad vessels of America. "Give us your flat-irons," the "ships in armour," have certainly come to signal grief. But they were not constructed on the lines laid down by Nelson the Glorie; and if the American wise man of Gotham will go to sea in a bowl covered with railway iron, they must expect dangerous results. Once upon a time, we saw the late Mr. Albert Grey, clown at Astley's, bestriding the bottom of the Thames in a washing-tub. Happy he, but the leaden-bottomed iron navigator would scarcely have ventured upon a trip to the Bay of Biscay in his eccentric craft. After all, the science of naval construction is new, and in its infancy, and will be liable to error and mishap for some time to come. A gentleman calling upon Beau Brummell one morning met his friend with the head of one of his cargenfull of crumpled white neckcloths. "These are our failures, Sir," the gentleman's gentleman explained, when interrogated. The Beau had only thrown a couple of dozen cravats before his friend on to his him. In like manner armour-plating in naval architecture must, we suppose, have its "failures" for the golden mean, when the right thing is found.

Specimens of prodigious length seem now to be the order of the day. In olden times three days were thought an unprecedented spell for a trial at law, but at present great cases drag their slow length along for weeks together. Kennedy v. Brown and Sir Hugh Cairns will come to an end; provided, always, that it doesn't go into Error and up to the House of Lords. As it stands, however, the Lord Chancellor, Lord and his learned colleagues have decided that a barrister is, no more than a physician, entitled to sue for his fees. The amount of guineas marked on a barrister's brief is to be considered as the price of an honorium, donative, or free gift, nothing more. Away, then, goes the verdict for £20,000 awarded by a Warwick jury to Mr. Serjeant Ludlow for his undeniably great services to Mrs. Patience Brown in the great Swinfen case. The lady is in possession of the estates, and Mr. Kennedy to have nothing at all. Serjeant Ludlow, we fancy, will have the apologue of the lawyer and the oyster is reversed. "What a fat oyster!" the lawyer is reported to have said as he ate it whole to console himself with.

Another monstrous lawsuit: but of which the web of litigation is not yet wholly unravelled by Vice Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood. The Earl of Egmont versus the Hon. Sir Lionel Darell may afford a new chapter to Sir Bernard Burke for the fourth edition of his "Romance of Noble Families." The late romance of poor Lord Cockham and the barony of Wentworth is thrown into the shade by the strange and mysterious history of the Earl of Egmont, who, twenty years ago, lived under the assumed name of Lovell, haunted places and acquired habits certainly not of a most extraordinary nature for a man of his British peerage, and died, disinheriting his relatives, and bequeathing his large estate to his lawyer, Sir Edward Sugden, and to the heir of the will and he who benefited by it are both dead, and another generation is called upon to witness a fiercely-contested fight between the heirs-at-law of the respective parties.

The Grand Committee of St. Thomas's Hospital are yet undecided about a site for the new foundation; but the project for removing the hospital to Wandsworth or anywhere else out of town seems to have been definitively abandoned. Of the sites now under consideration, the most eligible appear to be that of Bethlehem Hospital, although the price asked by the governors of that charity is very high; such, a large plot of ground behind Newgate Prison; and, lastly, a space, not very extensive as to acreage, and which has to be partially reclaimed from the river, close to Stangate, and directly opposite the new Houses of Parliament. Mr. Cowper and the Government are understood to look with great favour on this last-named scheme, which, architecturally considered, is an admirable one. A most sumptuous vis-à-vis to the Palace at Westminster might be constructed—for the hospital authorities are surely rich enough to lodge their patients palatially—and the embankment of the southern side of the Thames materially furthered; but it is objected that an hospital close to the foot of Westminster-bridge would be too far south-west to meet the requirements of the poor of Southwark and Lambeth.

An art sale of great importance has taken place in Paris. The magnificent collection of paintings, porcelain, &c., belonging to Baron Jerome Demidoff, was then brought to the hammer at the Hotel Drouot. What, indeed, does not come to the hammer of M. Pillet-Will and Co. in the Rue Lafayette? Everything, I believe, on other day. Mme. Marie Taglioni sold off all her diamonds, and the sackcloth, ashes, and penitence, &c., appropriate to the Carmelite nun and now the Russian millionaire has made a tabula rasa of his gallery. The prices brought, albeit handsome, were not of a nature to astound Parisian connoisseurs. The modest sum of five thousand guineas for a square inch of painted canvas. The largest sum realised was for the renowned "Bénédictine," by Ingres, which fetched 92,000 francs, against 65,000 francs, the selling price ten years since. Decamp's "Samson" sold for 45,000 francs, Greuze's "Dame Charitable" for 40,000 francs, Meissonier's "Mousquetaire," for 37,000 francs; a Rembrandt for 8000 francs, and Gérôme's "The Greek" for 8500 francs; a Rembrandt for 8000 francs, and Gérôme's "The Greek" for 8500 francs; a Rembrandt for 8000 francs, and Gérôme's "The Greek" for 8500 francs; a Rembrandt for 8000 francs, and Gérôme's "The curios," including some magnificent snuffboxes and a suit of armour made for Francis I., and chased by Benvenuto Cellini, also commanded "rarity" prices.

THE DISTRESS IN THE NORTH.

ALTHOUGH Mr. Farnall was able to report to the Central Relief Committee, on the 19th inst., a continued diminution in the number of persons in receipt of parochial relief, he at the same time also intimated that the operatives "as they are assured by various competent authorities that it will not be prudent to reckon during the next six months upon any material change in the state of manufactures in this country prior to the American War. The committee have received from all parts of the country during the past month 91 sums of less than £6,000,000. Mr. Farnall has been instituting an inquiry into the health of the distressed districts, and reports that of the 141 districts from which he has received returns 111 are wholly free from typhus fever; in the remaining 30 this disorder prevails to a very limited extent. Throughout the whole of the districts visited by the Rev. Mr. Greenville states that he has found no instance of destitution proceeding from intemperance. In several places general subscriptions, made early in the crisis, have been opened. Mr. Farnall has received from Mr. Arrigoni, of Bradford, the amount of £10,000 was raised in a single day, and afterwards augmented to £20,000, which sum has been expended. Mr. Farnall has also received, without exception, the gratuitous labours of the secretary to the Mansion House on the 24th inst., which stood to the existing surplus of £4,721, and which is expected to be £12,000, of which £8683 was from home, and £3680 from colonial and other sources. One hundred and fifty-six sums of £100 each, making in all £15,600, have been sent at Bristol; and sixty-five large assorted bales had been transmitted during the past week from Liverpool, bringing the total to 1,000 bales by the 21st inst. £4000 was received from Calcutta in aid of the fund, making in all £21,000 received from India.

The Southampton Christmas entertainment, on the 16th inst., in aid of the distress fund, yielded nearly £200.

The Lieutenant-Governor of the Isle of Man, Francis Pigott Stanley Conant, Esq., died at Hockfield on the 21st inst.

Signor Giuglini is announced to appear at the Sixth Concert of Sacred Music, which will be given on the 25th inst. Among others next, the 25th inst.

Said Pasha, Viceroy of Egypt, died on the 18th inst. The deceased Prince was one of the sons of Mehemet Ali, and was born in 1822. On the 19th inst. his funeral ceremony was celebrated on the 18th inst. A great concourse was present at the funeral. The Viceroy is succeeded by Ismail Pasha, his nephew, son of Ibrahim Pacha. Ismail Pacha has formerly filled the post of Minister of War, and has received a liberal education in Europe, and the foreign Consuls. Public opinion is very favourable to the new Viceroy.

Archbishop Whately has addressed a letter to Mrs. H. B. Stowe, in which he says that the Southern States "do not believe to be "a prevailing sentiments here on American affairs." He says, "Your "very generous heart will be glad to hear that there is much more "sympathy with the South than you suppose." But for the greater portion sympathise with neither completely, but cannot help feeling glad about the misfortunes of America, considering the rude and property thus can be compensated for by any advantage they can dream of accruing to themselves. The Archbishop concludes by saying, "I think that there is no plan so good as the gradual one of imposing an ad valorem duty on cotton, to be raised from time to time according to the opinion to Government to purchase at that price. He fears, however, with good reason, that the South will not agree to any terms that involve the idea of submission.

Another severe gale has raged along the coast. Several shipwrecks are reported, in some cases attended with loss of life; and a large amount of property has been lost. The wreck has occurred at the mouth of the Tees, at Southport, and Blackpool. The boats of the National Life-boat Institution have been actively employed. The Shipwrecked Fishermen have reported from various places inland. The storm was severely felt in London, and in different parts of the country, and on the line of the Great Western the places was extensively damaged; and in the Thames sundry small craft were driven from their moorings and damaged. On the night of the 19th inst. the named Bradford, who was navigating a barge off Pickle-herring-spur, was blown into the sea and drowned. He was married, and left a family. Most of the night and a man and his two sons who were on board were drowned. A fishing vessel demolished the roof of a house in Bethnal-green, killing one of the inmates.

ELECTION INTELLIGENCE.—The election of a member to serve in Parliament for the borough of Totnes, in the room of Lord Seymour, resulted in the return of Mr. Seymour. The numbers were—Mr. Seymour (L.), 297; Mr. Bayly (C.), 291. The election of a member to serve in Parliament for the borough of Reigate has been published in the Gazette.—Lord George Manners is the only candidate. The election of a member to serve in Parliament for Lancaster, about to be occasioned by the retirement of Mr. E. Ball, Mr. Moody has issued an address announcing his intention of commencing his canvass immediately. Mr. Moody has represented the borough of Lancaster in the House of Commons. Mr. W. H. F. G. Langton, of Hatch Park, Somerset, has issued his address to the electors of the Eastern Division of Surrey, offering himself in the Conservative interest. Mr. R. N. Grenville states that he has not yet decided whether he will contest the Bath vacancy. He intends, however, to "stand" for the eastern division of the county.

There has been a most prodigious and extensive smuggling in York. At the Guildhall, on the 19th inst., Lewis Terry, Lewis Joseph Terry, and Edward Hattersley, were charged with unshipping, carrying, and concealing certain dutiable goods, on the 16th inst., without the permission of the Commissioners of the Customs' Consolidation Act. On the 7th inst. the prisoner rented a warehouse in Skeldergate, Skeldergate, York, and on the same day three packages of furniture were unshipped at Hull, from the Pacha, and, according to the declaration made by the prisoner transmitted to the North Eastern Railway in York, for delivery to the prisoner, under the name of Pattison. On forwarding the packages, the prisoner signed a bond in the customary form, churea s number of casks. He waited upon an official of the North-Eastern Railway, and requested that the casks might be delivered at the warehouse, and consigned to Edinburgh. The disparity in the weight of the casks, however, prompted the officials to open them, when they found that the casks were presented, led to some suspicion and to their being seized by Mr. Haley, chief officer of the Customs at York. The warehouse in Skeldergate was then found to contain 4430lb. of cigars and 176lb. of manufactured tobacco. The prisoner was arrested and brought before the Mayor, when he was committed in few more cigars and 56lb. of tobacco. The warehouse taken by the prisoner was afterwards searched by the officers, when a quantity of tobacco concealed from the Pacha and delivered to the prisoner were found to consist of sofar, in the embrasure and backs of which the tobacco and cigars had been ingeniously concealed as to pass the Custom-house officers without exciting suspicion. The house to which the cigars and tobacco had been consigned in Edinburgh had also been searched, and a further quantity of smuggled goods found. The goods were valued at £500 3s. 7d. The Lord Mayor and the Bench were clearly of opinion that the prisoner was guilty of smuggling, under the action which had been referred to, and they therefore fined him in the penalty of £1388 6s. 3d., this sum being triple the value of the tobacco and cigars; and in the legal proceedings which would have to be taken, they would be instructed to proceed upon another information against the prisoner, this being the minimum penalty under the section of the statute under which he was fined. The tobacco concealed in his lodgings. The prisoner pleaded guilty, and was fined £100 and costs.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

Her Majesty's regiments throughout India have shown great liberality in subscribing to the Cotton Distress Relief Fund.

Brigadier Staveley, C.B., has resigned the China command, in which he will be succeeded by Brigadier-General W. G. Brown, commanding the 2nd Brigade at Aldershott.

The non-commissioned officers of the 1st battalion 24th Regiment, stationed at Aldershott, celebrated the fourteenth anniversary of the victory of Chillianwallah on the night of the 13th inst., by a ball.

The Triton, 3, 260-horse power, is ordered to be immediately commissioned with a complement of seventy-five officers and men, including Royal Marines.

The iron paddle-wheel steamer Recruit, 6, 150-horse power, undergoing some extensive alterations to her hull and machinery at Chatham, is ordered to have her repairs converted as rapidly as possible, in the dockyard there, and be immediately commissioned.

Major Hugh Rowlands Rowlands, Under-Secretary of State for War, accompanied by Major-General A. Tulloh, Director General of Ordnance, paid an official visit to the several departments of the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich, on the 16th inst.

Arrangements are being made at Shoeburyness for a complete trial of the 300-pounder muzzle-loading Armstrong gun, recently received from the Royal Arsenal, and also for the official competitive trial between the Armstrong and Whitworth guns.

A Royal warrant has been promulgated at Chatham garrison announcing that it is the intention of her Majesty to grant a certain number of silver medals, with clasps, to officers and non-commissioned officers of the Army "for meritorious service. In certain cases medals and gratuities will also be awarded "for distinguished conduct in the field." In any part of the world; and medals, without gratuity or annuity, for meritorious service.

The question of launching the first armour-plate iron ship from frigate Achilles, 58, at Chatham Dockyard, was successfully accomplished on the 19th inst., in the presence of thousands. The ship is the Achilles in course of construction. The plate operated upon was one of a large number supplied to the Admiralty from the Royal Iron Works, Yorkshire. Its dimensions were 15ft. 3in. in length, 3ft. 2in. in breadth, and 4½in. in thickness, the weight being 3 tons 11 cwt.

During the last few days a troop of Royal Horse Artillery, with a train of ten waggons, have been actively employed in removing several 6 and 32 pounder guns, with a considerable quantity of ammunition from Kent, to Dover. The men stationed at the castle expect to receive orders to proceed to Malta in the course of the present month, but as the move is a condition as to justify apprehensions of danger. No. 1 Battery, rather more than a mile from the castle, is in a similarly shaky state, and is being dismantled.

Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. D. C. F. De Ros and the officers of the 1st Life Guards gave a ball at the Cavalry Barracks, Windsor, on the 14th inst. A mile in length of the house was decorated with evergreens and elegantly fitted up for the convenience of the company. The walls of the promenade displayed captured Russian banners and numerous trophies, cuirasses, pistols, &c. The Duke and Duchess d'Aumale, accompanied by the Countess de Gontaut Biron, arrived at the Castle from Claremont, and commenced at ten o'clock, and the company did not separate till an advanced hour in the morning.

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

The report of the council of the National Rifle Association which has been issued to the members states that the state of society's affairs inspires a strong confidence in its permanent prosperity and success. The balance-sheet shows an excess of income over expenditure for the current year of £241, which, added to the existing surplus of £4171, leaves a balance in favour of the association at the close of the financial year of £4909.

The strength of the 4th Middlesex (London Irish Rifles) has been lately considerably augmented, her Majesty's sanction has been obtained for its consolidation into a battalion of ten companies, and it now numbers seven effective members of the battalion. The plate is to be shot for four times in the year, and each competitor pulling at least seven rounds at each shot, is entitled to it as his own. The match came off at the new range just completed by the London Irish Rifles, on Easter Monday, 1862 (Harrow Road). The leading scores made were by Messrs. J. O. Dawe, George Mills, S. T. Holland, and T. P. Hickey. The match was won by Mr. Dawe, who is the first "battalion shot" of the current year, took the lead with a centre.

On the 19th inst. the battalion contest between the second battalion of the Queen's (Westminster) and the 20th Middlesex (Artists') came off at the butts of the London Scottish Rifles, at Wimbledon. The second battalion of the Queen's (Westminster) Rifles, under the command of Major was arranged to come off on Friday, at the range of the 20th Middlesex.

The prize-shooting of the London Irish Rifles was brought to a close on the 16th inst., at Child's-hill, Hampstead, by the contest for a gold cup, presented by the Marquis of Donegal. The medal was won by Mr. O'Connor.

Lord Truro, Lieutenant-Colonel commanding the 4th Middlesex, or South Middlesex Rifles, has issued to the members of the corps the prizes won at rifle-shooting during the past season, on the 17th inst. The ceremony took place in the Drill-shed, Wellington-street, and was a full assemblage.

The competition for the borough of Marylebone challenge cup, presented by Lord Fermoy, M.P., and Mr. Harvey Lewis, M.P., took place on the 19th inst., at Wormwood-scrubbs. The West Middlesex proved the victorious corps.

The members of the 40th Middlesex, not having been able to obtain a theatre for their annual ball, and annual assembly, generously devoted their energies to getting up a ball, the first one which has been given by the regiment, at the Crystal Palace, on the Whitsuntide Club on the 14th inst. The result was a great success.

The annual distribution of prizes among the members of the Queen's Westminster Rifle Volunteers took place on the 14th inst., at the Schoolrooms. The prizes given were thirty in number, the corps mustering 128 members, including the officers.

The annual ball in connection with the members of the 1st Sussex Rifles took place on the 15th inst., at the Royal Pavilion, Brighton. The great room in which the entertainment was held was tastefully and profusely decorated with flags, evergreens, and military devices. Between 300 and 400 persons were present, including many ladies.

The Southgate Corps Rifle Association has just held its annual meeting—the thirteenth since its formation. It was proved on society had a balance in hand, at the close of 1862, of £111, although post targets, which had been purchased during the year, Colonel Adair was elected president for 1863.

In Cambridgeshire a return-match has taken place between steel to steel, at a banquet at the Whittlesea and Ely Corps. The Ely gentlemen made 411 marks while their opponents obtained only 397.

The Knaresborough volunteers were entertained, on the 15th inst., at a banquet at the Drill-hall, at which grave were presented to those who had most regularly attended at drill, the recipients being Corporal Pickard, Sergeant J. Wilkinson, and Private Thomas Hammond. On the 10th North York gave a grand ball last week, which was attended by most of the gentry of the district. On Saturday, being over 150 strong, the North York Volunteers have also acted in a similar manner, when upwards of 100 attended. Two of the companies of the 1st West York Volunteers met on the 17th inst., on the ground of the latter company, and the Leyburn men won by a majority of 46 marks.

Vice-Admiral Grenfell, of the Brazilian Service, and Consul-General for Brazil in the United Kingdom, has been promoted to the rank of Admiral in Brazil.

The steam-ship Great Eastern, Captain Paton, from New York, at 9.15 a.m. on the 19th inst., arrived in Queenstown the same on 4 o'clock on the morning of the 17th inst., having waited outside all night on account of the thick weather which prevailed. She brought 1023 cabin and a large number of steerage passengers. Her comparatively long voyage was caused by her having to put into Cork after her supply of coal (upwards of 3000 tons of grain, &c.), her draught of water on her arrival being 28ft. The cabin passengers speak highly of Captain Paton's conduct, in which they desire to thank him, and to extend their thanks even to the most subordinate officer of the ship, for the unremitting attentions which each and all have experienced on the voyage—kindness and attention which made the voyage a pleasure more of less to every one in the ship, and which will remain long in the Atlantic. They also express their high satisfaction with the ship and her performances in every respect. The second and third class passengers also joined in a similar testimonial; and all classes speak in highly favourable terms of the ship as affording an immunity from sea-sickness, and express themselves as hopeful—indeed, certain—that the great ship will prove herself in every way successful, both as a passenger and as a cargo ship. The Great Eastern had a death and a birth on board during her last passage from America. A passenger named Joseph Bermuthhaler died; and Mrs. Paton, the wife of the captain, gave birth to a son.

The death is recorded of M. Andrzane, the companion in captivity of Silvio Pellico, at Spielberg.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE Chester Cup, on the whole, is considered to be a good handicap, and the top weight, Asteroid, 9st. 4lb., does not seem out of it by any means. Roman Eee, 6st. 10lb., is the highest weighted three-year-old. Oldminster, 8st. 3lb., is thought to have caught it heavily; and it is rather odd that Mr. Topham should consider him only 6lb., and the Northamptonshire Stakes handicapper 12lb., worse than Vandoit. Trying by the same rule, they also differ to 6lb. about Dunb's and Earl of Surrey's form, to 7lb. about Mona, Philippo's and Elysician's, and to 8lb. about Zetland's. The so-called "great things" have been scratched already:—another warning to the betters by anticipation. Doncaster has hardly been so busy at an autumn Meeting since this January, and the couple of 200 sov. stakes, the last remnant of the old régime, have fairly filled out. The Stewards' Plate at Stockbridge, on Tuesday, is a great entry, with Asteroid, Fairwater, Buckstone, Tim Whiffler, Zetland, and the Marquis amongst them, and the Cup, the last relic of horses in training a very goodly sight. Lord Stamford has no less than sixty-two horses in training, and Mr. Cookson, Osborne Hall, Fulford, York, Mr. J. Scott (lo. Col. Townley's), T. Cliff (51), Godding (50), W. Day (45), T. S. Dawson (40), Jennings (36), T. Dawson (32), Stevens (32), and Grant (29), all master well. It is amazing that Lord Clifden is to be removed from Godmersham Park to Tolscomb, near Lewes, to do his Derby work. Carruthers and Cresswell the jockeys, have been laid up at Epsom within a week of each other last August, and it is rather a curious coincidence that the sporting papers should announce the illness of the chief jockey Hornit.." He and his hounds have, we hear, "excellent fun, without let or hindrance." We believe that it is quite settled that Colonel Anson will take the hounds, but that it is not at all likely to hunt the hounds. During the last ten days there has been a succession of good runs in Leicestershire. Mr. Tailby has had a burster of forty-five minutes on Saturday from Cotton Covert, and killed; and on Monday Lord Stamford's had a splendid thirty-five minutes by Parker over the stiffest part of Quorndon, and killed at Little Dalby. Goddard leaves Mr. Tailby, and on the that he quarrels with the celebrated pace further down the Vale. He resigns the mastership of the Ledlow hounds, and it is said that Mr. Murray succeeds him. In Durham the meets have been unusually severe during the last three or four days; and frost, and snow, and wind have quite put an end to sport.

Mills is the second great man in the world to run him for any distance from one to ten miles. The Sporting Life announces that there was a match between Sayers and the hon-and-no-stamina Heenan, and that they really covered 11 miles 790 yards, the most extraordinary performance on record. Deerfoot offers to run 11½ miles if any one will back him.

The Manchester Guardian states that negotiations are pending between Mr. Gurney and Mr. Cleveland Hutchinson for a match for another Eleven to Australia at the end of the 1863 season, and that the Eleven may probably comprise G. Parr (captain), Daft, Jackson, Grundy, Caffyn, Hayward, Tarrant, Anderson, Wisden, Lillywhite, and H. H. Stephenson. It is to be hoped that the North will not have all the "selection" upon which matches depend, and we suspect but that Mr. Jackson will offer to look his favourite trio—Hayward, Carpenter, and Tarrant—for a "monkey" against any other trio in the kingdom. The Ice Lord is with us. Even in the south it has amused Newmarket not a little with its pony and broomstick matches, and we should be not sorry to see a set at Lord Bridge's, its little way it has made quite as much noise and ill-feeling as "the affair of the Ice Hook" itself.

The cousins meetings for next week are as follows:—Barton-upon-Humber, on Tuesday and Wednesday; Lincoln, Thursday and Friday; Gorleston on Wednesday and Thursday; and Great Crosby and White Horse Club, on Thursday.

The Queen's Bench Plea have given a reading of the much-disputed points of the New Game Act, in Brown and Others (appellants) v. Turner (respondent). The appellants had been convicted, and, relying on the high road, one of them with five rabbits, and the rest, with one exception, carrying nets and other poaching articles. The magistrates raised two questions for the opinion of the Court—first, whether or not it was incumbent upon the respondent to prove that the appellants had been unlawfully in pursuit of game; and, secondly, whether there was sufficient evidence for the magistrates to come to the conclusion that the appellants had been in pursuit of game, or had used nets or other means for the purpose of unlawfully taking game. The Court gave judgment for the policeman originally assailed. Chief Justice Pole observed:—"I am strongly suspected that any person had game about him he had a right to search him, and if he found game about him which he had reason to believe was got unlawfully he had a right to take him before the justices. In this case the evidence was conclusive. The appellants were found with game and nets, and rabbits, and one of their coats bore marks of blood and rabbit's fur. The justices were quite right in the conclusion they came to, and in the Lord Chief Justice) was of opinion that to prove that a man had been trespassing in pursuit of game a policeman was not bound to produce evidence that the private property had been actually entered. The Justices had a right to deal with the facts of the case according to the truth of the evidence the facts led to." To unite the partridge and sneckle the hare has always been considered a crime without benefit of clergy on the country benches; and we can only trust that the latitude which this decision gives may not lead to the loosest jurists' in future, and bring an Act which was very much needed into contempt. So far it has worked well, and we owe a debt of gratitude to the construction of the Act has operated as a salutary check upon magistrates over-zealous for game.

The English Consul at Khartoom and his wife have been drowned in the White Nile.

The barp of Queen Marie Antoinette, which she bequeathed to her confessor, Henri, is now deposited, with the documents, with M. Landauer, Frankfort-on-the-Maine.

There are thirty-three notices of motion on the order book of the House of Commons, several on the question of the income tax. Mr. Wyld has the following on tickets of leave:—"Address for papers and returns relative to the grant of ticket-of-leave licences to the convicts of transportation beyond the seas."

The capital of the Great Western Railway Company have earned a circular which cannot fail to gratify their constituents, the shareholders, as it shows that they have made arrangements with the London and South-Western Railway Company, and the London and North-Western Railway Company, by which existing lines will be rendered available for each other Company, by which existing lines will be rendered available for each other Company, by which existing lines will be rendered available for each other treading on the heels of the former during a long career of guilt, in order to avenge the wrongs committed by a powerful offender. We have already described the means by which the Captain compels the Prince to convict himself—means which oppose intelligence to brute force, and reduce mere physical power to a condition of infantile weakness. It is the triumph of mind with which we sympathise in such a denouement; and indeed in the general action of the piece, notwithstanding the hero is a swordsman and ready to meet offences with his weapon's point, he prefers to employ his wits for the solution of difficulties. Even in the most barbarous ages the real victory lies with intelligence, for brute force itself cannot advance a step without it, though, of course, it endeavours to pursue its ends with as little of the objectionable commodity as possible. Age by age a little is added to that little until it arrives at something like an equality with material power, and then soon acquires the ascendancy. In some such sentiment as this lies the true interest of this bustling and romantic drama, and we sympathise with the hero whenever he succeeds in outwitting his powerful but wicked adversaries. That the drama is skilfully constructed, so as to generate and keep alive this sort of interest, is generally acknowledged; and, with Mr. Fechter's excellent acting, it can hardly fail of maintaining its popularity. We must not, however, expect that, in the absence of the domestic sentiment, it will be so generally attractive as it might have been if the main action of the drama had appealed to the heart rather than to the head. But it will do its work in its own special department of art, and vindicate its claims to favour.

THE RANDALL FOUNTAIN, MAIDSTONE.

A DRINKING-FOUNTAIN, the gift of Mr. Alexander Randall, has recently been erected in High-street, Maidstone. The design consists of a statue of the Queen, placed upon a lofty base beneath a highly-decorated Gothic canopy, surmounted by a crocketed pinnacle, the whole height from the ground to the summit of the latter being 32ft. The statue, which is rather above life-size, is a remarkably successful work. It is of pure white Sicilian marble, and the attitude and the disposition of the drapery are singularly felicitous. The former is easy and natural, and at the same time regal and dignified; while the latter not only avoids the stiffness and conventionalism which have spoiled so many otherwise excellent sculptures, but furnishes a gracefulness and finish which add inestimably to the beauty of the figure. The face is finely chiselled, and the expression pleasing and lifelike. The canopy presents on each of the four sides a pointed arch of good proportions; the pillars at each corner, of polished marble, support beautifully-sculptured effigies of the four archangels—Michael, Gabriel, Raphael, and Azrael—which have a very pleasing effect. The interior of the roof, so to speak, is grained, and will hereafter be enriched with colours and gilding. On each side of the base is a tablet of polished marble, on one of which, that facing the west, is the inscription—"The gift of Alexander Randall to his native town, 1862." Over each tablet are shields exhibiting the arms of the donor and of the town; and above is the Kentish horse. The whole structure is admirable, and does much credit to the reputation of the late eminent sculptor Mr. Thomas, who designed and partly executed it. The work was erected under the supervision of Mr. Blandford, architect. Our Engraving is from a photograph by Mr. J. Price, of Maidstone.

We learn from the Maidstone and Kentish Journal, to which we are indebted for the above particulars, that the opening day was kept with great rejoicings. We have not room for details, but we extract a portion of the Mayor's address on accepting the fountain, on behalf of his fellow-townsmen, from Mr. Randall, giving, as it does, an insight into the donor's character:—"This is only a repetition of those many proofs of your strong regard for your native town and the comfort and prosperity of its inhabitants, and years and years will pass away before the remembrance of them will be effaced. Whenever the improvement or embellishment of the town, or the creation or enlargement of its charities, or the more numerous but more private necessities of the poor have arisen, your purse has been the first to open and your heart the first to expand. This noble memento of your liberality will always be present to remind succeeding generations how much we are indebted to you, and by this example to incite them to similar works of kindness and generosity." The auspicious event was further celebrated by a public dinner.

PARK CHURCH, HIGHBURY.

This edifice is one of the large handsome churches in course of completion in the metropolis for the United Presbyterian Church. The building, which has recently been opened, is situated in Grosvenor-road, Highbury New Park, within a short distance of the North London Railway, and is for the congregation under the pastoral care of the Rev. John Edmond, D.D.

The church consists of a spacious parallelogram, 75ft. in height and 60ft. in width, and is quite free from the obstruction of columns. Galleries extend around three sides of the building. The ceiling has a bold cove on each side, breaking over the windows, and the ribs which support the tie-beams of the roof spring from enriched corbels. The main timbers of the roof are not hidden, but are decorated with bold transverses arches of wood, connecting together the queen-posts from bay to bay. The interior is lighted by long semicircular-headed windows, filled in with ornamental iron frames and figured glass. The pulpit platform is enriched with fretwork, and the seats of the side aisles are made to converge to face the platform, that the officiating minister may be visible from every portion of the building. Ample accommodation is provided for upwards of 1000 persons.

Beneath the church there is a commodious lecture-hall, 60ft. long by 48ft. wide; also a session-room, minister's vestry, waiting-room, &c., entered on each side from a lobby, and also from the front. A broad flight of stone steps, under a handsome Doric portico, form the main access from the road to the entrance doors. At the angle of the church nearest the New River is a very lofty pinnacled tower and spire, forming a conspicuous object, being 160ft. high from the level of the roadway. The building, which is in the Italian style, is faced with white Suffolk bricks with Bath stone dressings, and has been erected from the designs of Edward Habershon, Esq., architect, Bedford-place, Russell-square. The contract for the erection of the church was taken by Mr. Sawyer, of Dulwich, for the sum of £6536. The edifice is ornamentally lighted by gas sunlights, heated with hot water, and provided with every convenience.

John Henderson, Esq., of Park, Glasgow, by whom the "memorial stone" was laid on the 18th of August last, has afforded most material help to the undertaking, as he has done to similar works.

PARK CHURCH, HIGHBURY.

A SAILORS' TRIBUTE.

JOHN HOSKINS BROWN, Esq., C.B., Commander R.N., Registrar-General of Seamen, &c., has recently had presented to him a handsome silver cup by 600 men of the Royal Naval Reserve in the ports of Sunderland and Seaham. The design of the cup, which was, we understand, by Captain Heard, R.N., is purely nautical and of the most elegant description. The body is in the form of a vase, and is supported on three dolphins, resting on a base, round the lower edge of which is a hawser, modelled after that round the base of the Nelson Column in Trafalgar-square. Two mermaids form the handles. The lid is composed of shells. On the raised centre of the lid, which is chased to represent the deck of a ship, stands a seaman of the Royal Naval Reserve in the attitude of defence, having in his right hand his cutlass and supporting in his left the union jack. One side of the cup bears the following inscription:—"A sailors' tribute of gratitude and respect to John Hoskins Brown, Esq., C.B., Commander, R.N., Registrar-General of Seamen, &c., from the men of the Royal Naval Reserve in the ports of Sunderland and Seaham, in acknowledgment of the great benefits which, by the formation of that force, he has conferred on the merchant seamen of the United Kingdom. December 25, 1862." On the other side of the cup are Captain Brown's arms and motto.

This is really a present of which the recipient may well feel proud. It is, as the inscription on it states, "a sailors' tribute of respect and gratitude." It is the spontaneous gift of about five hundred of the seamen of the Royal Naval Reserve, who are deeply sensible of the great boon they have received by joining the reserve force, and for which benefits they are entirely indebted to the indefatigable exertions of Captain Brown, in first inducing the Government to establish the Royal Naval Reserve; afterwards, by overcoming their prejudices against anything that savoured of entering the Queen's service, and finally inducing them to enrol in it.

The cup, we understand, cost thirty-five guineas; and, had not an anxiety to present it to the gallant Captain as a Christmas gift induced the men to close the subscription-list, double that sum would soon have been subscribed, so desirous was every man on his arrival at the port to subscribe his shilling.

CUP PRESENTED TO J. H. BROWN, ESQ., REGISTRAR-GENERAL OF SEAMEN.

NEW MUSIC.

CRAMER, BEALE, and WOOD'S PIANOFORTE GALLERY, 207 and 209, Regent-street.

Every Instrument may be tuned on to at least equal to the Philharmonic pitch of C. Interior Instruments are carefully excluded from the stock.

Pianofortes by all the eminent English, Continental, and American Manufacturers, for hire or HIRE.

ERARD'S NEW BOUDOIR GRAND PIANOFORTE.—Messrs. Erard have manufactured this new Instrument with a view of meeting the great demand for Pianofortes of a more convenient size than the Grand Pianoforte, and more powerful and impressive are, for the present, only to be had of Messrs. CRAMER, BEALE, and WOOD, who have taken the Agency for the Sale of the New Boudoir Grand. Nos. 207 and 209, Regent-street.

NEW MODEL PIANOFORTE.—CRAMER, BEALE, and WOOD manufacture a very elegant Cottage Pianoforte, of the medium size and of the best description, 6ft. 6in. high, handsomely Trichord, with Check Action, Repetition, Trapwork, &c., for 60 guineas.—207 and 209, Regent-street.

EARLY TWENTY PURCHASE.—CRAMER, BEALE, and WOOD make special arrangements with those desirous to PAY for a PIANOFORTE by INSTALMENTS. Terms and Prices on application at their Pianoforte Gallery.—207 and 209, Regent-street.

THE DRAWING-ROOM COTTAGE. CRAMER, BEALE, and WOOD manufacture a Cottage Pianoforte of the best description, and of the very first quality of tone, in full, pure, and vocal. The touch is splendid, the check action perfect, and the workmanship of the most solid character. The elegance of design, quality of wood, and general richness of appearance recommend for it universal approbation. No better Pianoforte of this class can possibly be made. In rosewood, 36 guineas; walnut, 42 guineas.—207 and 209, Regent-street.

COLLARD and COLLARD'S NEW PIANOFORTE, 7 octaves, with a peculiarly sustained and most effective equivalent check-action. CRAMER, BEALE, and WOOD have received 50 guineas for the first Pianoforte of this description. Price (in rosewood) 50 guineas.—207 and 209, Regent-street.

JOHN BROADWOOD and SON'S NEW HORI-ZONTAL, with three strings in the treble. CRAMER, BEALE, and WOOD have the honour of being appointed Agents for the sale of these celebrated Pianofortes. "THE SERENADE."—PAINTED BY MORELLI, OF NAPLES.

We recently gave some intimation of the probable reason why several of the artists who contributed most to astonish the visitor to the Great National Italian Exhibition at Florence out of the usual depreciatory estimate of the present condition of Italian art did not contribute their works to our International Exhibition. The treatment by the Italian commissioners of a picture by Morelli, sent to South Kensington, was a sufficient proof of the justice of their apprehensions. Now, this Signor Morelli is acknowledged to be at the very head of that remarkable new school of art—and high art, too, in the best sense—which is springing up at Naples. Ex uno, he sent a large, strikingly original, and admirably painted picture to our exhibition. It was entitled "The Iconoclasts" (2328 in the catalogue), and represents a priest assailed by a furious and insulting crowd, who taunt him, while smashing the pictures and images of saints and tearing up the illuminated choral service before his eyes. Very probably the reader did not observe this remarkable work. And why? Because the average quality of the Italian pictures on "the line" was so low, and some few were so detestable, that he did not trouble himself to look some twelve feet above the floor, the height at which this picture by Signor Morelli was placed.

We are very glad, then, of the opportunity of making the amende within our power to this distinguished artist by engraving his picture, "The Serenade," which has already made its reputation at the Florentine Exhibition and received one of the gold medals. The subject is altogether delightfully suggestive of Italy, its climate, architecture, and history, the music-loving tastes and gallant customs of its inhabitants. Who can wonder at men's love so much in the open air in the delicious climate of Italy? What more natural than that musical people should meet and play in the delicious cool of the fragrant evening after the heat of the day? Music, indeed, hath charms under such circumstances, and is there maiden's heart in the warm and love-breathing south that is not in that poetical twilight hour more than usually susceptible to impressions from the ardent crescendos and the tender or plaintive diminuendos of the violino; from the passionate throbbings of the mandola or the silver pulses of the mandolino; from the swelling waves of harmony wafted by several melodious voices, and, above all, perhaps from one voice which will make itself heard apart from the rest by the height of its exultant ecstacy or the depth of its tremulous pleading?

Our picture awakes numberless reminiscences of the land of Petrarch and Tasso, Boccaccio and Ariosto, Giotto, Donatello, and Raphael. Everywhere it has couleur locale, or memories of the past, in the rich and picturesque costumes, in that pleasant pergola-covered recess, in those coupses of black and white marble alternating like the cathedral of Siena or Giotto's fairy campanile at Florence, in the bassorelievo over the doorway, in the Italian Gothic window to which that lady has been blushingly attracted, in the loggia beyond, with its idle (or perhaps jealous) listener; in its distant tower, similar to that of the Palazzo Vecchio at Florence, and even in that little equatting ragazzetto and ragazzina. The serenading party have evidently determined to "go home" respectably and before "morning doth appear," as the lantern is placed in readiness on the ground; but the coy painter seems to have resolved to leave us in a little uncertainty and bewilderment regarding other matters, and we are in a state of some incertitude and bewilderment regarding other matters, and we are in a state of some incertitude and bewilderment accordingly. We strongly suspect, however, that that youth who has sidled away from his musical friends so far has some motive, some expectation of an interview, in keeping so near that peaceful Pyramus and Thisbe, eh, Mr. Morelli? May be; but we leave all these knotty points to the reader's superior sagacity.

"THE SERENADE," BY MORELLI, OF NAPLES.

"SNOWSTORM; STEAM-BOAT OFF A HARBOUR'S MOUTH MAKING SIGNALS."

PAINTED BY TURNER, IN THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

In the Royal Academy catalogue for 1842 (the year this picture was exhibited) the full title ran thus:—"Snowstorm; Steam-boat off a Harbour's Mouth Making Signals, in Shallow Water, and Going by the Lead." It also informs us that the painter was himself in this storm, in the Ariel, off Harwich. The picture belongs, from internal evidence as well as date, to the third period into which all Turner's critics have agreed to divide his works. Mr. Ruskin admits that the works of the last five years of this period (1846-1850) are unworthy of him, but many are disposed to almost double this number of years. Whatever may be the opinions of his worshippers now, this picture provoked almost unanimously adverse criticism upon its exhibition. Some of the critics described it as a mass of "soapsuds and whitewash." "Turner," says Mr. Ruskin, "was passing the evening at my father's house on the day this criticism came out; and, after dinner, sitting in his armchair by the fire, I heard him muttering low to himself, at intervals, 'Soapsuds and whitewash,' again, and again, and again. At last I went to him, asking why he minded what they said. Then he burst out, 'Soapsuds and whitewash! What would they have? I wonder what they think the sea's like? I wish they'd been in it.'"

Such coarsely-expressed criticism was indeed unjust, as well as unfeeling; and the picture drew from Mr. Ruskin a most ingenious and eloquent eulogium in the first volume of "Modern Painters." The passage we allude to is admirable in itself as a description of natural phenomena and so memorably related to this picture that we must venture, long as it is, to give it in its entirety:—

"Few people, comparatively," commences this incomparable special pleader, "have ever seen the effect on the sea of a powerful gale continued without intermission for three or four days and nights; and, to those who have not, I believe it must be unimaginable, not from the mere force or size of surge, but from the complete annihilation of the limit between sea and air. The water, from its prolonged agitation, is beaten, not into mere creaming foam, but into masses of accumulated yeast, which hang in ropes and wreaths from wave to wave, and, where one curls over to break, form a festoon like a drapery from its edge; these are taken up by the wind, not in dissipated dust, but visibly, in writhing, hanging, coiling masses, which make the air white and thick as with snow, only the flakes are a foot or two long each. The surges themselves are full of foam in their very bodies underneath, making them white all through, as the water is under a great cataract, and their masses, being thus half water and half air, are torn to pieces by the wind wherever they rise and carried away in roaring smoke, which chokes and strangles like actual water. Add to this, that when the air has been exhausted of its moisture by long rain, the spray of the sea is caught by it and conceive the surges themselves in their utmost pitch of power, velocity, vastness and madness, lifting themselves in precipices and peaks, burrowed with their whirl of ascent through all this chaos, and you will understand that there is indeed no distinction left between the sea and air; that no object, nor horizon, nor any landmark or natural evidence of position is left; that the heaven is all spray and the ocean all cloud; and that you can see no further in any direction than you could see through a cataract! [!] Suppose the effect of the first sunbeam sent from above to show this annihilation to itself, and you have the sea-picture of the Academy, 1842, the 'Snow-storm,' one of the very grandest statements of sea-motion, mist, and light that has ever been put on canvas, even by Turner. Of course it was not understood (its finest works never can); but there was some apology for the public's not comprehending this, for few people have had the opportunity of seeing the sea at such a time, and, when they have, cannot face it. To hold by a mast or a rock and watch it is a prolonged endurance of drowning which few people have courage to go through. To those who have it is one of the noblest lessons of Nature."

Now, we dare not claim the degree of "courage" Mr. Ruskin alludes to, and the possession of which enabled that gentleman to make the observations embodied in this description, because in the few storms we have witnessed or encountered on our own coasts and in the Mediterranean we have always been able, although they were sufficiently unpleasant in each of their effects, to see in every direction further than we "could have done through a cataract." In the very picture Mr. Ruskin illustrates, Turner also must have seen further, since he gives us a whole steamer, with blazing signals, flaming, smoking funnel, and glowing cabin windows, almost as plainly as was his wont to paint any object about this time. Allowance must, of course, be made for rhetorical exaggeration; but this allowance being freely conceded, the description does not then accurately apply. Is it not strange that we hear of foam, and yeast, and spray, and rain-cloud, &c., and nothing about the effect of the "snow" itself, which would certainly be the most salient phenomenon? Analysing further, we believe it would be found Turner meant to describe that, although the effects of the storm still remained, the force of the wind had somewhat abated, because the snow descends not very slantingly: and that, therefore, the "yeast" could not be taken by the wind, as described, nor (for the same reason) would the surges be "half air." Moreover, we think the theory of the exhausted humidity of the atmosphere would certainly not be admitted by a meteorologist, except under very rare conditions; and the fancy, judging from a reference given in a note, seems to have arisen in the author's mind from the rapid evaporation which takes place after a sudden shower, simply from the surface of the earth, or water, being warmer than the cooled atmosphere, or when the sun bursts upon a rocky part which has not absorbed the rain. Under any circumstances, this theory cannot apply here, for the sun has little power, the atmosphere is still laden with snow, and down both sides of the picture still fall the torn edges of the storm-cloud, heavy as a veil of sackcloth with its laden weight of snow flakes.

We are, in reference to this picture, bound to express our belief that Turner, in that part of his career in which he worked so nobly, but in vain, to reproduce the dreams of his own mind, or the most unapproachable phenomena of nature, having seen a terrific snow-storm, resolved to attempt to convey his own transcendant impression; but as actual facts were then, in passing through his mind, habitually and systematically subordinated to a set arrangement of effect and colour, he has produced something which may, we grant, be suggestive to a few highly imaginative persons, and is, beside, delightful, if regarded as a technical feat in painting, just as is a fantasia in music, but which is almost valueless for what Mr. Ruskin would have us believe it—namely, a true statement of the real, or possible, or paintable facts of nature.

THE ROYAL MEET OF THE NORFOLK HUNT AT SNETTISHAM.

Norfolk may be said to have had a fox-hunting "revival" during the last week, and it is quite to be hoped that the effects will be permanent. Some-thing like Lincolnshire and Norfolk, and it has been rather uphill work for the masters. Mr. Hoford, of Weston Hall, to the Duke of Beaufort's Hunt, and several others, have proved that foxes and pheasants are perfectly compatible when the keeper is staunch and does not grudge the foxes a share of the game-preserves; but Norfolk pheasant-covers and rabbit-warrens have been sadly fatal spots to "Charley" and "Reynard." Sir Jacob Astley hunted ten seasons in Norfolk four days a week, and turned down one hundred and fifty foxes, but he had to complain that too many were "taken care of" by gamekeepers and others. Jos Hewitt, his huntsman, tells, among other Norfolk reminiscences, in "Scott and Sebright," of a difficulty on the part of a too-preserving steward, which could hardly have occurred in any other county:—"The steward at Gawdy Hall, which is just on the Suffolk border, was well disposed, but had only been entered to pheasants and rabbits. Trusting to his natural instincts, the first time Sir Jacob met there he rode furiously down the road the moment he espied Joe and the hounds, and called out, 'You're too late, huntsman; I've got all my men together to beat the cover, and we've found such a beautiful fox!' He seemed to feel that he had acted very prudently, and so strictly with a view to sport, that, as there was no help for it, Joe swallowed his feelings, and did not care to undeceive him, but simply inquired the line. It seemed a nice one, over grass to a wood," &c.

The liberality and earnestness of the present masters of the two how or other the sport has never struck deeper roots in the fatherland of turnips and partridges, and it has been rather uphill work for the masters. Mr. Hoford, of Weston Hall, to the Duke of Beaufort's Hunt, and several others, have proved that foxes and pheasants are perfectly compatible when the keeper is staunch and does not grudge the foxes a share of the game-preserves; but Norfolk pheasant-covers and rabbit-warrens have been sadly fatal spots to "Charley" and "Reynard." packs, Lord Hastings and Mr. Villebois, have been pretty well responded to, but it was not a full field that met the latter fellow's call on Saturday, that fashionable is the fashion in Norfolk at last. The meet with Mr. Villebois was fixed for eleven o'clock at Snettisham. The village was astir at an early hour, and flags were fluttering in the breeze, whilst the villagers had made a triumphal arch at the entrance to the hall, with the word "Welcome" on a piece of drapery suspended therefrom. By ten o'clock the public had begun to arrive in right good earnest, the Hunstanton train, a train containing about 250 persons from Lynn, amongst whom were the High Sheriff of Norfolk, with other county gentlemen, arrived, as well as gentlemen from various parts of the adjoining counties of Cambridgeshire and Lincolnshire. Every kind of vehicle, from the carriage to the dog-cart, took the road that day; and the display of the fair sex, both Norfolk and Norfolk ale, with the true "anchor action" was worth all the trudge to the pedestrians. The number present was estimated at from 1500 to 2000 persons. Mr. H. Villebois, the popular master of the hunt, arrived at about a quarter before eleven, and some of the principal meet of the hunt being about to breakfast, which had been liberally provided by Captain Campbell, of Snettisham Hall. Shortly after eleven the Prince, accompanied by Captain Keppel, R.N., arrived in a private carriage and proceeded to the "meet," on a piece of sloping ground behind Snettisham Hall, where the hounds were met by the largest "field" ever known with the West Norfolk hounds, numbering from five to six hundred horsemen. After the usual ceremony had been gone through between the Prince and the leading gentlemen of the hunt, his Royal Highness intimated his readiness to commence, and the hounds were taken off to Cane-hill cover, at the top of a very large hill, where several brace of foxes were soon on foot. However, it was not until after nine o'clock that such an hour had arrived in running one of them into the open in the direction of Hunstanton, over a pretty stiff country. The hounds, about six or seven miles from the start (the hounds ran it) in the open, was terminated in about thirty-two minutes more, by which a kill in a large field was effected. Throughout his Royal Highness was well up at the kill, and Mr. Villebois requested that he would honour the field by accepting the "brush."

A CARIBOU HUNT IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

CARIBOU-HUNTING is the favourite winter sport in the Canadas and in the Lower Provinces of British North America. Through the courtesy of Dr. Charles G. D. Roberts, of St. John, New Brunswick, we are enabled to give, on pages 88 and 89, illustrations of a caribou hunt in that province. Mr. Wand gives the accompanying description of the hunt:—

In the city of St. John, N.B., on a bright, cold afternoon in January, I was introduced to Sebatis and four ever-excited Indians, by my friend Mr. Wand, ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS and Punch, by the arrival of a telegram from my friend Mr. Lemuel Allan Captain of the St. George steamboat, informing me to come down to St. George without delay, as the Indians had come in from a successful hunt, and the ice was favourable for a caribou chase. I set to work immediately to hunt out all the paraphernalia requisite for a ten-days' camping-out party. The snow-shoes, blankets, provisions, blankets, buffalo robes, cutlass, and drinkables. The next morning, a little after daybreak, I took the road to St. George, and arrived there about noon over the ice road. A few days previously some rain had fallen, succeeded by a sharp frost, which made the road almost as slippery as glass. As the ice seems to be driving under such circumstances would frequently find the head of his horse pointing the opposite way to which it was travelling. Sebatis's only way to obviate such an unpleasant state of affairs is, the instant the sleigh begins to veer round, to jump out, and, seizing the horse's head, to turn it, as the horse commencing the sidelong movement of the sleigh, at the same time keeps it from its fall upon the ice. The sleigh is then set right, and completely round with much velocity as to throw him, and this may happen half-a-dozen times in a mile.

No pen could do justice to the beauty of the scenery on the road; it was literally a fairy-land, overhanging with the dark green pine trees on the beach, birch, and maple trees, and the cedars frost had festooned it in every direction with the most beautiful and delicate wreaths of the snowbird hung grotesque icicles; others were partly covered and festooned with the snow from every passing sleigh, so that the trees at times were like massive silver fringes, and the sun's rays, striking upon the whole, produced a scene of enchantment that would set the pencil of a Gustave Doré and one could fancy in the realisation of some fairy tale of the olden time as the gilded sleigh of the royal suitor entered the enchanted forest during the winter skies.

After a pleasant drive of forty-five miles through such scenes as these, varied with an occasional pipe and once halting on the road, I arrived at my friend Mr. Allan's, for so early a destination as St. George, and commenced to enjoy a hard hunt. Sebatis, the Passamquoddy Indian; and a word of description as regards him would not be out of place. In height about five feet and muscular in form, with a pleasant though serious countenance; black hair, prominent nose, and a most determined expression of mouth and chin. It treated as an equal, he was obliging and would do anything for you, and as an energetic man of business he would not accept pay for his labour. On the contrary, if he was employed on a hunt, and any superiority or reserve was manifested towards him, he would not accept pay, and would act as a true friend of his agreement, but nothing further. Fear or surprise were words of which he knew not the meaning, and in short, the embodiment of Campbell's line, "A stole of the woods, a man without a tear."

Our arrangements being completed, the next day, about noon, we started, made a fair, or rather, I should say, unfair, start; for, having concluded to drive our horses as far as the ice would allow us, and as the roads from that day had never been driven together before, we found that we had reckoned without our host. The ice had formed a good deal of ground-swell during the previous night, but, this being nothing unusual, had not taken any notice of it, and by the time to move had arrived, found our horses in. Nimrod's mare (a runaway devil) was in the shafts, and mine as leader, with a team of two more of each, and Sebatis and his brother-in-law, an Indian agent, acting as outriders—Mitchaw, Matagamon, and Mogaltig (Angling Brook, and Big Cariboo)—all mounted on their ponies, and, apparently, having managed to get our mare Friday and ourselves seated, and Nimrod's wife and child in the rear sleigh, with the dogs, and we were off, and away, by the wheeler plunging and the leader standing on her hind legs; and then, with a loud whoop-hoo, a wave of the hand and a cut, would set off by turning the pony upside down in a snow-drift in front of Nimrod's horse, and then, seeing Sebatis about to start, I would cut to the leader and, taking right, the latter to let go this time was followed by a run on the part of the ponies, the accompanied by the loss of the bridesmaids and the bolting of the hounds. With some clear shaving we managed to turn the corner, and the rest of the ride, say ten miles, being accomplished at a more moderate pace, we succeeded in Nimrod that he looked very like a runaway. He replied, "Oh, not by any a little piece." Sebatis, "Oh, no, by no means." Nimrod, "Certainly." Sebatis holding on each side of the pung, with a rein under each arm, and, most probably in consideration of consistency, the rest of the lash in his hand, and must make the most of it. So long as the road was all clear we were all right; but about two miles from the upper lake, Sebatis, upon coming to a very sharp turn we saw a sleigh with two ladies in it coming towards us. It was a bad place to pass—a pass-up lengthways—and Sebatis and myself were placed on the lower side to prevent a sleigh shaving down a ravine. "Now, then, Nimrod, pull in to the right hand!" "Which is the right hand, and their sleigh robes." "Go on, then!" A nod, a smile, a glimpse of pretty faces, and we were off. They say quick "Hallo, Nimrod, you are going to run!" The pung will go over the hill!" "All right, old boy! Hold on the upper side," is my reply. "Don't be afraid, I'll look after you." But I happened to be on the lower side, as I found to my cost on the sleigh bringing up with a crash on the lower side of the road, precipitating me and my gun and ammunition and the whole of our commissariat, over the bank, I along with a dash-grip to an old hound, and down we went, a distance of the ravine, displaying more of the dogs than any serious damage. Nimrod managed to keep his seat and hold the horses from coming to grief, and I repack the pung, and we were once more off again.

After crossing five beautiful lakes, my favourite haunts in summer for fishing and sketching, we arrived at Stone's camp on Spark's Lake. Here we found a very good camp, consisting of two logs, with a roof of spruce, and a young Mohawk on a visit to Sebatis), and another hound Illusion—Angelus, wolf—and being a right handsome fellow, too, the hounds were all of a shaggy, the case, no matter who you are or whence you come; and if the fare is rough, you must make the best of it, and many wonderful stories are told with the axe or the rifle.

Seeing our camp well rubbed down and cared for, and strapping on our snow-shoes, we set out, Indian file, for the hunting-grounds on the Lepreaux lakes, about seven miles distant. The hounds were unmuzzled, and, as they liked, and led the way, followed by Nimrod and myself, to make a trail for the tobogganing party to put down. The tobogganing party consisted of two sleighs with broad sabre runners. A trail made by three pairs of snow-shoes will bear up a hundred men, and dragging our sleighs after us, we had no trouble to make occurrence took place on our deploying Indian file on a lake where lumbering operations were being carried on: the unusual spectacle of two men attired in blanket coats of divers colours, with the tobogganing, hounds, &c., caused a stampede among the horse teams, and with one cutting, in spite of the efforts of their drivers, they beat a hasty retreat, and it was not without some difficulty that they were brought back to their work.

Just as we came in sight of one of the Lepreaux lakes (Lake Adelaide) we all dropped in our tracks at a signal from Sebatis, and, creeping to the edge of the wood, we saw a herd of five caribou a long way out of shot on the lake. They had evidently heard or winded us, for they were trotting rapidly off, their sharp hoofs cutting the ice like a winter-shod horse. Sebatis pointed out their lake as being, about thirty years ago, the scene of a most dreadful tragedy:—Two Indian families were living in that neighbourhood, distant about four miles from each other. An old squaw one day left one of the camps to visit the other, and, returning from her visit without being observed, the Indians became alarmed at her protracted absence and set out in search of her. An appearance of something on the ice attracted their attention, which, to their horror, on a closer inspection, proved to be the remains of the old squaw. A few bones and bits of rags were all that were left, while the broken tomahawk and three monstrous wolves lying gaunt and stark testified to a most terrible revenge.

We arrived at our camping-ground, by the side of a small lake, about three o'clock p.m., and immediately set to work to build a comfortable camp. The modus operandi is as follows:—A space the size of the intended camp is marked out, and the snow is shovelled away to the depth of about a foot or two—as shown in the frame of the camp is then set up, consisting of poles and logs, and the roof is covered with spruce boughs. The floor is then covered with spruce boughs on the ground. The whole is then thickly covered with fir-boughs and two sheets of calico. The fire is then lighted in front of the camp, and the camp is complete. The cooking of the camp is then laid with boughs and two large billets are rolled up to the fire, and the camp is complete. Having done, we proceeded to cut down our pipes and hot mountain dew, and listen to thrilling Indian stories of the chase, and wonder how the deuce we should ever manage to get to sleep. English, and was a most intelligent Indian; and I often sat up conversing with him until the small hours of the morning. Having become quite conversant with Lish's vocabulary of English consisted of "Yes," "No," and "I suppose so," and, in answer to any question one was in the habit of asking, whatever was the question was invariably answered by "I suppose so."

The morning was bright and cold. About two inches of snow had fallen during the night, which rendered snow-shoeing easy. Sebatis prepared our breakfast, and we fortified ourselves for the day with a hearty meal of tea and crusts. Our camp was situated on a long arm leading to the Lake Victoria, a lake about four miles in length and two in breadth. About half-way down the lake we came upon the fresh tracks of caribou, which he said he had seen the night before, and we instantly decided upon following them up. The trail was a fresh one, and we had not gone more than a half from the place where we first struck it Sebatis pointed out where the caribou had been resting, "Cariboo lie down there last night; certain caribou he go far this morning, caribou he not go far. The hounds were now unmuzzled, and, with a moment's delay, were on the trail. Sebatis cautioned us against the slightest noise, and, taking off the outlying portion of our clothing, the temperature about ten below zero, and my only chance of reaching the game was by following the trail by easy pace, and, with the exception of the chance of my following the trail back to camp, for a somewhat little more than a mile. Sebatis now and then came to a halt, and, pointing to the trail, would be seen from these remarks that everything depends upon the good faith of the hounds. The trail now ascends a long hill, and, finding some very fresh sign, he told me to put on my snow-shoes and take up my position on the summit of the hill, as the caribou would most probably cross there. The caribou (caribou, like the hare, when turned always take their back trail), and, with a few words of encouragement, he left me to my fate. I had not been long at my station until the hounds came in sight. And I was left to my own meditations. The temperature about ten below zero, and my only chance of reaching the game was by following the trail by easy pace

Mr. Rouch has likewise some small but very pleasing instantaneous views of the Isle of Wight, taken, we presume, with his ingenious portable apparatus. Talking of clouds, the visitor may be not a little surprised to find identically the same curiously-shaped cloud in some dozen of Mr. Vernon Heath's photographs. Pasting the impossibility of joining the sky to the landscape in the ordinary photograph, this photographer has resorted to the expedient of keeping a stock sky on hand and making it do duty over and over again by means of a separate printing, thereby falsifying nature, and, what is worse, truth in art, to the undoubted conditions of his art. Apart from this Mr. Vernon Heath's views and foreground vignettes have much merit. Several of Mr. Annan's landscape and other views have a beautiful key of relative artistical gradation. The contributions of Mr. Henry White are extremely tender. Discerning communication, also, are the views by Mr. Allin; although, sometimes, if possible, too microscopic in effect through their sharpness of detail); Mr. Mudd's "East Grinstead Church;" Mr. S. Thomas's "Cathedral, Salisbury," of "Corfe;" Messrs. Rothergill and Brandt, of "Grosmont" (by the tannin process), Lieut.-Colonel Wilkes, by Dudley, of "Tewkesbury," &c.; Lady Scarlett, of Lord Palmerston's seat, at "Brandlands," and Mr. J. H. Morgan, Secretary to the photographic and many photographic by the Amateur Photographic Association exhibited by Messrs. M'Lean, Melhuish, and Co.

Photography is eminently suitable for rendering architectural subjects, but there are few besides those by Mr. Bedford, and others mentioned incidentally, which could be pronounced worthy of a place part of the collection, except a very striking view by Mr. Edman, of "St. Martin's church from Fall-mall," in the early dawn.

In portraiture, photographers still labour under peculiar difficulties. The defects of photographic portraits arise from various causes, always defined. Hence, the unpleasant effects of hard lines, the focal and perspective distortion. Next, the blue rays of light possess so much photogenic power that (in the "positive") the blue eye comes out colourless as water, while the delicate bloom of youthful epidermis, and the atmospheric tints which soften the lines of age, are lost. The latter, in opposite phase of other colours to the sky, blur looks dyed if golden or red, and—from the tendency of shining light to spread—in proportion as it is more carefully combed and greased. From this last cause, too, the spectrum or point of light in the eye is exaggerated till it gives a vacant stare, and the shadow of the nose, which should be bounded, throws back. Hence, not to mention the forced and unnatural expression of most "sitters," we can understand why portraits are critically beautiful or valuable in the portraits. But if we are content with an authentic map or chart of the face, how much to value and admire Mr. Claudet has many striking likenesses of distinguished personages, male and female. Two portraits by Mr. Jeffrey, of Tennyson and Carlyle, struck up at very favourable distance. But unquestionably the purest and most pleasing portraits are the vignettes by Mr. H. J. Williams. These photographs have caught the artistic merit of giving the sharpness and the indefiniteness exactly in the right place: an essential principle in the "handling" of the portrait painter, and carried to the greatest perfection, perhaps, by Vandyke. Photographers are at a loss to understand why the portraits by this Artist are so much superior; but we think there is no secret from superior chemical manipulation, but simply from the employment of great taste in the management of lights and shades. However, we must take this opportunity of protesting against the growing use of painted backgrounds in cartes-de-visite, &c., as, apart from the frequent bad drawing, the accessories are always inappropriate and delusive.

The acknowledged deficiencies of even the best photographic portraits may seem to afford a sufficient excuse for calling in the colourist. No person, however, with any just notions of either art or photography can for a moment admire the roseate complexions, and the unconscious production which has neither the approximate truth of science nor the dignity of that of art. If it is to be coloured, the process against what so directly flatters the vanity of the unthinking. We have only to add, however the mode of applying colour which shall preserve the photographic basis in its integrity. Mr. Claudet's oil paint is obviously inadmissible; while transparent tinting is water-colour, hardly the best means to that end. Mr. Beard's is the method employed by Messrs. Lock and Whitfield in their numerous specimens, and certainly we have seen nothing more, if so much, artistic skill. Some of the larger examples of colouring seem sent as a caution rather than anything else. In the latter case, the colouring is carried to the extreme of the subjects "printed" in carbon, by Messrs. Walker and Son, which prove that we may actually by rag the life out of a picture washed away without leaving any of the "smudginess" of the earlier examples. The extreme value of this discovery is, that the "carbon print" is now almost indestructible, and the best photographic positives fade in a few years. We regretted not to find in the Exhibition any specimens of the photoglyphography and photo-lithography, discovered by Colonel Sir Henry James, and the beautiful photo-carbon printing developed by Captain Scott, and applied by those gentlemen with such success for the multiplication of copies of the "Ordnance Survey," "Domesday Book," &c. In the case of the Ordnance Survey, the Government relations to this collection, there are, however, specimens of heliography and carbon printing. As regards the former, photo-lithography has already exhibited in the various courts of the international building, we need not again review it here.

There are many photographic apparatus, albums, indestructible photographs on enamel, and stereoscopic slides, including a series from the Stereoscopic Institution and Mr. Breese's so-called "new light" slides, i.e., instantaneous stereographs with a painted moon.

According to the last accounts from British Columbia, a gold region, such as Cariboo, had been discovered at Jansen Lake, out of which the Peace River flows.

Postage-stamps for the Ottoman postal service have been issued. They are on sale at the chief office in Stamboul, and at all the district and minor offices throughout the Ottoman Empire.

The Emperor Francis-Joseph has conferred on Baron Anthony de Rothschild, Consul-General for Austria in London, the Order of the Golden Crown, second class.

The Augsburg Gazette has the following :—"We learn from authentic sources that the Archduke Maximilian of Austria has been sent to the library of the College of Augsburg by the Emperor Napoleon, who was formerly a pupil in that establishment, to take the command in the new one of the Gauls, in the drawing out of which the Emperor took part."

"A cross of a new order," says the Presse, "may be seen in the Gallery Colonnade of the Palais Royal. It is that of Radama I., King of Madagascar. He has just given an order in Paris for 12,000*f.* worth of cross, which is to be presented to the people by a Royal envoy, and is surprised by a red ribbon with transversal stripes of a darker shade."

The Emperor Napoleon of Canada, New Zealand, have appropriated a sum of £16,000 for granting five pensions to that person to female domestic servants of good character, and single men and married couples having a large family of their own, who have lived for many years in the same district. The arrangements for carrying out the object, it is understood, are left to the Provincial Emigration Commissioners.

Catalani, one of the Maori Kings in New Zealand, has just published the first number of a paper, the name of which, we believe, has not been arrived at Nga-rauhe, from it proceeds the newspapers, accordingly powerful to say that the Government has come to you the price it brought by it, if you approve. The good of this press is to carry our intentions to the Poles of the Queen, hence manifestly fixed are the words of the beginning—"Faith, love, law."

The pearl fisheries of Ceylon are in a flourishing state. If ground conditions be fulfilled, a magnificent harvest will be gathered, from that source, may be expected during this year, and, even making allowance for disappointments, the Colombo Observer is confident that, at the very lowest estimate, £50,000 will be realised from this source during 1863, and with the prospect of the pearl-banks yielding a net return of from £100,000 to £150,000 in the next three years.

The Brandenburger Zeitung reports that the fire in the quarters in the neighbourhood of Bootzen, which has long been raging, has extended to such a degree that it is dangerous to pass over the grounds in some districts. Thus, some days ago a vehicle, drawn by two horses, was suddenly swallowed up, together with the driver, not far from the village of Lamaletzke, in the country is so understood that in some spots the deep abyss is covered with a thin crust, which gives way beneath an object of any weight, precipitating it, as in this case mentioned, into the burning cavity, where nothing can save it from destruction.

COLUMN FOR THE CURIOUS.

GAMING AT CHRISTMAS.—BASSET TOKEN.

GAMING was formerly a Royal pastime of the Christmas holidays which the subjects of the Sovereign were permitted to witness. The play ran high in Charles II.'s time, and it lasted almost to our day: George I. and George II. played on certain days at hazard in public at the groom-porter's inn in James's Palace, where the nobility and even the Princesses staked considerable sums. This gaming in public was discontinued for some time in the reign of George III. The office of groom-porter, we are told, still occurs in the enumeration of the palace household.

The groom-porter of old is described as an officer of the Royal household whose business it was to see the King's lodging furnished with table, stools, chairs, and dice; to keep a watch-light burning, &c., and to decide disputes arising at cards, dice, bowling, &c. Formerly he was allowed to keep an open gambling-table at Christmas in Ben Jonson's "Alchymist" we find—

> He will win you
> By irresistible luck, within this fortnight,
> Enough to buy a barony. They will set him
> Upmost at the groom-porter's, in all the clubs,
> And for the whole year through at every place.

We have engraved an illustration of this holiday play—at Basset—a game at cards spread by Dr. Johnson to have been invented at Venice. It was certainly known in Italy as early as the end of the thirteenth century. It was introduced into France from Italy, and into England at the end of the seventeenth century. Who does not recollect Pope's charming eclogue, the Basset-table?—

> But of what use were else that breast be form'd,
> To gaze on Basset, and remain unwarm'd?
> When Kings, Queens, Knaves appear in ev'ry card,
> Exposed in glorious heaps the tempting bank,
> Guineas, half-guineas, shine alternately,
> The winner's pleasure, and the loser's pain;
> In bright confusion open rouleaux lie.
> They strike the soul and glitter in the eye.
> Fired by the sight, all actions prove forgot,
> My passions rise, and will not bear the rein,
> Look upon Basset, you who reason boast,
> And see if reason must not there be lost.

At the Groom-porter's batter'd bullies play,
Some Dukes at Marybone, perhaps may play;
But who the bow'r or rattling dice compares
To Basset's silver tokens and gilt chairs?

The Engraving shows a silver token marked to the amount of ten pounds, which appears to have passed among the players for the groom-porter's benefit at Basset. It is within the size of half-a-crown; in the centre of the obverse is D.X.; legend round, AT THE GROOM-PORTER'S HOUSE; round the edge, A.—Z. On the reverse, a wreath and gold coronet; the coronet being of gold let in; legend, NOTHING VENTURED NOTHING WINES; mint-mark again, a fleur-de-lis. We do not know the exact date of this token. The game, possessed of this token, for permission to engrave it.

SILVER BASSET TOKEN: AMOUNT, £10.

Theodore Hook, in one of his novels, has this note of experience upon the above subject:—"The room at St. James's formerly appropriated to hazard was remarkably dark, and conventionally called by the inmates the Cellar. Some such name was thoroughly supposed, from their own demerits, all the gaming-houses in London are designated by the best of the cant words. Hell, Pandemonium, and have played, English hazard, will recollect that, for a similar inconsequent reason, the Cellar was given up the dice and called the odds was designated 'the groom-porter.'

CHANGES IN COVENT-GARDEN.—This locality, perhaps the most interesting portion of the metropolis, because its history can be so minutely traced, has of late parted with a few of its memorable houses. We have lost Cross-street, that short thoroughfare between King-street and Long-acre; but here Samuel Butler died, and Edward Cave, the bookseller, "Sylvanus Urban," and Dr. Johnson assisted and wounded by the hirelings of Wilmot, Earl of Rochester. In Southampton-street we have no longer "the oldest chemist and druggist's shop in London," for the old-fashioned house has been pulled down, in the laboratory in the rear that phosphorus was first made in England. In Bedford-street, the next corner's firm has disappeared; it was here that a large fortune was made from the famous macarine blue silk, the colour of the Cardinal's robes. Here lived Humphrey Wanley, the antiquary, as we gather from a letter in the Harleian MSS. from the Rev. Thomas Baker, Cambridge, Oct. 16 [1718], addressed "To the worshipful Mr. Humphrey Wanley, Librarian to the Duchess of Chandois and Bedford Streets, Covent Garden:" here we learn that the shop was also famed for its ruling-books. In the row of houses in Bedford-street, mentioned in our Journal of last week as just taken down, lodged the father of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, we think in No. 16, from the following record in Wright's "Historical Revs."

Mr. Sheridan one time lived in Bedford-street, opposite Henrietta-street, which ramps with the Duke of Bedford's workers so that the prospect he open the whole way, free of interruption. We were standing together at the drawing-room window, when Johnson, who lived in the same house, Mr. Sheridan asked me I see the length of the Garden? "No, Sir" (Mr. Sheridan was always profuse in his offers), "you may have it by measure. You may know him by his gait, I perceived him at a good distance, working along with a great variety of Quarterstaff motions, and at every step he took a stout step. At that time the bread flagging at each side of the street was not yet introduced, and the wheels of the carriages, which were numerous, grazed the posts as they passed. Upon every post, as he passed along, I could observe he bestowed a kick, which he hardly missed, and as he came near to the corner of Sheridan asked me I see the length of the Garden? "No, Sir" (Mr. Sheridan was always profuse in his offers), "you may have it by measure. You may know him by his gait, I perceived him at a good distance, working along with a great variety of Quarterstaff motions, and at every step he took a stout step. At that time the bread flagging at each side of the street was not yet introduced, and the wheels of the carriages, which were numerous, grazed the posts as they passed. Upon every post, as he passed along, I could observe he bestowed a kick, which he hardly missed, and as he came near to the corner of course, not omitting one till he gained the crossing. This, Mr. Sheridan assured me, however odd it might appear in reading or recital, was by no means distance, he seemed suddenly to recollect himself, and, immediately returning back, cautiously performed the same operation upon every post in his former course, not omitting one till he gained the crossing. This, Mr. Sheridan assured me, however odd it might appear in reading or recital, was by no means distance, he seemed suddenly to recollect himself, and, immediately returning back, cautiously performed the same operation upon every post in his former course, not omitting one till he gained the crossing. This, Mr. Sheridan assured me, however odd it might appear in reading or recital, was by no means

As the north-east corner of Bedford-street facing King-street and Long-acre, where Clay sold his papier-maché, has also been taken down, and a loftier house built for Mr. Mossey, the cutler and perfumer, who has also taken the house in Long-acre, wherein the invented papier-maché, as applied to teatrays, in 1760, and obtained a patent for the same. Some of the best of his trays were painted by early members of the Royal Academy.

EMBANKMENT OF THE THAMES.—THE ADELPHI-TERRACE. When, in 1768, it was proposed to commence the Embankment of the Thames at Hungerford-market, in passing the hill through Parliament a violent contest arose between the City and the Legislature of the Court. The proposition was referred to a committee, who recommended that the then bill should not pass. The City, considering their property to be exposed to encroachments, were heard by counsel. In consequence, in the twenty-first year of the reign of George III., a clause was inserted in the Act for the Embankment, which provided that no building should be erected between the City and the river Thames, nearer to the Middlesex shore than the Temple Gardens, and that the Embankment should not project beyond the line of the wharfs then standing. The Embankment was commenced on the site, commencing with Durham-yard (the courtyard of old Durham House), which, when bought by Messrs. Adam, was occupied by small, low-pitch houses, coalsheds, and haystalks, washed by the muddy deposits of the Thames.

SERJEANT-SURGEON TO THE SOVEREIGN.—The vacancy in this high office caused by the death of Sir Benjamin Brodie has been filled by the appointment of Mr. Cesar Henry Hawkins, F.R.S., President of the College of Surgeons in 1852 and in the past year. Her Majesty has two Serjeant-Surgeons—that Hector of surgery, Mr. Lawrence, being the senior.

The following surgeons held the appointment during the last eighty-five years:—Sir Cesar Hawkins, Bart.; Sir Anthony Addington, Baronet Hawkins, Charles Hawkins; Sir David Dundas, Bart.; Sir Everard Home, Bart.; Robt. Macgregor; Sir Astley P. Cooper, Bart.; Sir B. C. Brodie, Bart.; Robt. Keate (a private friend of William IV.), B. Travers, and W. Lawrence. Of the above twelve who have held the post, Sir David Dundas filled it for the longest period—thirty-four years—viz., 1792-1826.

With respect to the salaries paid, we find in a MS. list, date 1610, "To Gilbert Primrose, Serjeant-Surgeon to the King, £26 13s. 4d.; more to him as Surgeon to the King, £40;" and the same sums to William Goddeven, who was sworn in 1625, and Christopher Wren's "Anglia Notitia, 1695," is only named "Serjeant Chirurgeon William Gale," and "Mr. Cesar," £333; board-wages, £140 per annum. In John Chamberlayne's "Magnæ Britannie Notitia," 1726, is named only "Ambrose Dickens, Esq., Serjeant-Surgeon; sal. per ann., £396 13s. 4d." In the "Notitia," 1737, "William Cheselden, Esq.," is named as "Serjeant-Surgeon to George II.;" but he stipend is not mentioned.

One of the duties of the office was to attend the Sovereign in all battles. Hence, Mr. Lawrence has invaded France, had only one colleague surgeon with him, one Thomas Morstede, afterwards surgeon to Henry VI. He wrote "a goodley boke on chirurgery," which is now extremely rare. The person was authorized to press into many surgeons as he thought necessary; and it appears from Rymer's "Fœdera" that with this boke and a warrant in the days of Agincourt there landed only one surgeon, this same Thomas Morstede, who did, indeed, engage fifteen for that capacity; but these gentlemen were compelled to add a little lighting to their practice of surgery, and three of them acted as archers. He took into his service also Nicolas Colnet, as field-surgeon to the army. With such a retinue of staff, what must have been the state of the wounded after the day of battle? The pay was £10 quarterly and a gratuity daily for subsistence; but then both Morstede and Colnet could receive prisoners and plunder, and when the latter amounted to more than £20 in value a third part of it was given to the King.

BITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE VICEROY OF EGYPT.

His Highness Said Pacha, Viceroy of Egypt, who died on the 18th inst., was the fourth son of the late Mehemet Ali, Pacha of Egypt, and was born in 1822. He succeeded, the 14th of July, 1854, to the Viceroyalty on the death of his nephew, Abbas Pacha, who, on the occasion, issued in 1841, with the firmans the Government of Egypt to be hereditary in the family of Mohemet Ali, the eldest member living to succeed, and, failing male issue, the eldest male issue children, devoted herself wholly to his education. After receiving all the instruction which country could afford, he was sent abroad, where he went a course of European studies, under the direction of French professors, and especially of Koniz Bey, a Hungarian officer in the service of the Porte. At the Court, and who, on the accession of Said Pacha, was appointed confidential secretary. The splendour of the late Viceroy's intellectual powers was hailed by his love of active employment. Destined for the naval service by the express desire of his father, he was promoted to the rank of Captain in the navy, and in that capacity in the Palace of Gabbari, near Alexandria, at the period when the Crimean War broke out. He was then a decided admirer of Abbas Pacha. Three days afterwards he assumed supreme command of Cairo, and issued eight indictions of death on the part of Lord Dby, the head of the old bigoted party. He continued to display the utmost activity and energy in the command of Mehlik Pacha, and who took an honourable part in the expedition of Mehemet Ali to Syria, and in the internal affairs of the kingdom, the government of said Pacha has been, on the whole, progressive, and the best of his reforms, excellent. He undertook on second journey of inspection in the difficult provinces, more particularly in the Soudan, in which he was absent for a long period of seven months, the inclination of various improvements in the administration and the assessment and collection of taxes, which will be of infinite value sometime to the Government. The schools and scientific establishments on the European model, which he had established, were of the greatest importance to a fresh impulse under the authority of the Viceroy. His Highness, it will be remembered, was a visitor at the International Exhibition, in which he was then in that very ill state of health from which he never recovered. He lies in to be deplored as that of a loving and useful Oriental monarch.

LADY STOURTON.

The Right Hon. Catherine Winifred, Dowager Baroness Stourton, who died on the 27th ult., was the daughter and heiress of Sir Wm. Eyre, eldest daughter of Sir John Stanley Massy-Stanley, Bart., of Boston) of Thomas Weld, Esq., of Lulworth Castle, Dorsetshire, and sister of Joseph, late of the College of Jesuits, and was the sister of the late Cardinal Weld, of Lulworth. Her Ladyship was married in October, 1806, to William, seventeenth Baron Stourton (who died Dec. 4, 1816) she had five sons, two of whom survive her, and nine daughters, four of whom also survive her, and two have been married—Mrs. Thorsen, Dowager Lady Arundell, of Wardour, and Eleanora-Mary, widow of Colonel Peter Carrington Bowles, who died in Italy on the 3rd January last. Mrs. Bowles, who died in Italy on the 3rd January last. Lady Stourton's eldest son is Charles, eighteenth and present Lord Stourton, and cousin to the dormant baronies of Howard, Mowbray, and Braose of Gower.

LADY BRENTON.

Harriet Lady Brenton, whose death occurred on the 9th inst., at Brixham, at the vicarage of her son-in-law, the Rev. A. D. Crake, was the youngest daughter of the Hon. James Brenton, Judge of the Supreme Court of Halifax, Nova Scotia, and, on the 9th of August, 1832 (the month with), to the gallant Vice-Admiral Sir Jahleel Brenton, K.C.B., Governor of Greenwich Hospital, who by his eminent naval conduct was created a Baronet in 1812, and died on April 27, 1844. By this marriage Lady Brenton leaves an only daughter, Harriet Anne, wife of the Rev. A. D. Crake, M.A., Vicar of Brixham, Devon, and a lady of distinction in the literary world as a poetess, and a prose writer of fiction and of works of history. Lady Brenton, in accordance with her husband's service, enjoyed a pension from Government. Her stepson, Sir Jahleel Brenton, Bart., Rear-Admiral, and last Baronet of that name, died without issue in the June of last year; so that, unless it be (as it should be) assumed by one of her sisters, the title of Lady Brenton becomes extinct in our naval annals for more than one hundred and fifty years, will cease to exist.

THE COUNT DE BEAUREPAIRE.

Joseph Alexander Brun, Count de Beaurepaire-Louvagny, Officer of the Legion of Honour, Chevalier of St. Sepulchre, and of many other knightly Orders, died at Paris on the 8th inst., at the age of 76. He was born in 1787, the year, was a distinguished Norman diplomatist and savant. He had, under the Bourbon Sovereigns of the Restoration, filled the post of Secretary of Legation at London, and Minister Plenipotentiary at Constantinople, and, subsequently, at Madrid. Retiring into private life at the Revolution of 1830, the Count de Beaurepaire devoted his time to agriculture and science, and especially to archæology. As an agricultural writer he was considered to be the most eminent one of the richest proprietors of Normandy; and, in his scientific capacity, he wrote various publications which gained him much credit and left his name a member of most of the learned societies of France. He married Mdlle. de Tonillard, and leaves issue. The Count de Beaurepaire-Louvagny, who also represented, is of very ancient noble standing in Normandy; and the Count succeeded in very fine old château at Louvagny, near Falaise, where were many letters of Henry the Great, familiarity written to a scion of the line, Julien de Beaurepaire, who had been Governor of Falaise for Henry IV. The Count de Beaurepaire, just deceased, was the attached friend of M. de Montalembert.

CHARLES DANCE, ESQ.

Charles Dance, Esq., a dramatic writer of note, who died on the 5th inst., at Lowestoft, in the sixty-ninth year of his age, was, besides being a dramatist, successively Registrar, Taking Officer, and Chief Clerk of the late Insolvent Debtors' Court, and had been connected with that tribunal for upwards of thirty years. Mr. Dance wrote many pleasant theatrical pieces, and was at one time remarkable for the burlesque style of his entertainments, which were performed when Mdme. Vestris and the Olympic Theatre. He was one of the first, if not the first, of the class of burlesque writers who now carry that style of histrionic wit to extremes. Mr. Dance was the author of numerous comedietas, including "Beulah Spa," "The Morning Call," and "The County Squire." He, shortly before the passing of the New Bankruptcy Act abolishing the Insolvent Debtors' Court, applied for and obtained a superannuation for long-tried services. He was twice married, and survived both wives. He has left no children.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

THEY will have it—the Zadkiels and Francis Moores of the political almosphere—that the present Ministry is acting its house on order. That phrase, as it is to be interpreted from the present prophetic point of view, means that the Government is conscious of a coming struggle, and that they are not only preparing to enthid their opponents in a particular direction of public affairs, and using every ordinary and some extraordinary means of conciliation and winning the opinions of people out of doors; but that they are taking care of their friends who desire to have advancement, so far as peerages and baronetcies are concerned, conferred upon them. With this latter proceeding we in this column have not much to do; and it only concerns us so far as the rumour touches Sir Charles Wood, who is predicted for a peerage, and who, if so, has been making a sort of voluntary address to the constituents of Halifax. It seems that Sir Charles, who, with characteristic coolness, said not long ago before a committee of the House of Commons, that he believed he had filled more offices from time to time than any living statesman, has not been in the habit—indeed, never has been addicted to the habit—of making much of the comparatively virgin (politically) soil of Lumbeth—of appearing in what may be called very constituent wise in his own person. He has probably thought that a member who has such a knack of keeping himself a Member ought to be the last man in the world to be accosted as a bill of exchange is in payment, which is quite satisfactory when the chief party thereto is adequately responsible. But, from some cause or other, there have of late been symptoms of an idea that Sir Charles's thirty years' of the representation of Halifax has been rather a service of himself than of the electors; and the name of a local magnate has been murmured more or less loudly in connection with the next election. At any rate, there has been some reason why the bones and pockets of the denizens of the Borough for India have shown a proclivity towards Halifax, and, if they did not contain gold dust, were found there in unusual quantities. Then a former member for the borough, who is deservedly held in general esteem therein, suddenly declares that he has not hitherto been actually unpensioned—namely, decided adhesion to the Government, by accepting a titular distinction from them; and, lastly, Sir Charles leaves an announcement that he shall discover the real objects in the now established manner, and win back their golden opinions once more—which event, we may add, we sincerely hope, expected, this was apparently the worst move of all. To such as know much of Sir Charles's peculiar style of eloquence, it seems as if any man who had heard it as he had is to give would think he was following only a common dictate of humanity towards the members of an agency by which to save money, rather than endure through their ears in refusing to record it for a special agent of that suffering. It seems, in truth, that by a very logical sequence Sir Charles Wood, seeking to give practical reasons for his retirement, having addressed his constituents in a speech of two hours' length, the next thing for him to do is to talk for two hours more. This inference is obvious. If ever there was a contrast between two public speakers in the world which might be called, and has been, especially exhibited by Sir Charles Wood and his colleague, Mr. Stansfeld. The former—thick of utterance, rapid in delivery, involved to confusion in his style, seldom finishing a sentence and when he does using the end to be lost in a low murmur, which succeeds immediately to a loud burst which should be called vivid were it not for the manner of it—constantly misstating his facts and figure, correcting them incorrectly, and recreating until all is lost in one hopeless whirlpool of words—is the most accomplished writer of the age whose public ear enough to lend them to him when he makes what ought to be important statements to the House. The latter, remarkable at least for acuteness in his delivery, and trusting to carefully-marked intonations of a well-trained and naturally good voice for producing an impressiveness which would be wanting in words, with every word placed in its right place in each sentence, and every period turned to its proper close, ere almost it is begun to give you what think he was following only a common dictate of humanity towards the members of an agency by which to save money, rather than endure through their ears in refusing to record it for a special agent of that suffering. It seems, in truth, that by a very logical sequence Sir Charles Wood, seeking to give practical reasons for his retirement, having addressed his constituents in a speech of two hours' length, the next thing for him to do is to talk for two hours more. This inference is obvious. If ever there was a contrast between two public speakers in the world which might be called, and has been, especially exhibited by Sir Charles Wood and his colleague, Mr. Stansfeld. The former—thick of utterance, rapid in delivery, involved to confusion in his style, seldom finishing a sentence and when he does using the end to be lost in a low murmur, which succeeds immediately to a loud burst which should be called vivid were it not for the manner of it—constantly misstating his facts and figure, correcting them incorrectly, and recreating until all is lost in one hopeless whirlpool of words—is the most accomplished writer of the age whose public ear enough to lend them to him when he makes what ought to be important statements to the House. The latter, remarkable at least for acuteness in his delivery, and trusting to carefully-marked intonations of a well-trained and naturally good voice for producing an impressiveness which would be wanting in words, with every word placed in its right place in each sentence, and every period turned to its proper close, ere almost it is begun to give you what precision as his colleague does in the carelessness and involution of his attempts at grading oratory. In truth, it has been said that Mr. Stansfeld's style is not adapted for the House of Commons; and that a certain carelessness, as distinguished from impulsiveness, which characterises it, does not lie deeper than the outward mode of elocution. It was so at first; but even if he was too able a man not to adapt himself to his position, he was too much of a student to let the mere gilding of his oratory disappear before the very practical rubbings which it was sure to encounter in Parliament. On the occasion of his well-known speech against flogging in the army his speech showed marks of the new class of training to which he had been subjected; and it is probably safe to predict that, while preserving the power and the remarkable capabilities which he undoubtedly possesses, he will tone his mode of speaking to a point which will make it level with the taste of the Chamber. Mr. Stansfeld's recent address at Halifax will go far to correct a mistake which he personally has had political opinions, or rather theories, as they were deemed, were akin to his mercantile, that is, quite of a transcendental order. He has been supposed to be a Republican of a Spartan kind, or a calculator upon the prospective of the free State of Utopia, or any other political condition which might be impracticable in the eyes of decent practicability. If he has described himself truly in his last manifesto, he has ripened or decayed, according to men's opinions, into a very practical and reasonable politician. He cannot be said to have unpractively moderate ends by such machinery as is accessible, and to possess the valuable quality of patience and tact. If he may be permitted us to give an opinion on such a matter, we should say that Mr. Stansfeld's career as a statesman has commenced.

It is something to command listening ensation (a few of them, be it understood), to have leading articles written about one (in the dull season, when the subjects are scarce), to be able to command, to disclose the secrets of the diplomacy of the leading spirits of Europe (which they do not previously know anything about themselves). These proud distinctions are reflected upon Bridgewater, because they are enjoyed by their member. If we were called on to say in a word what was Mr. Kinglake's distinguishing quality, we should say it was gustation. As with his books (it is books at last—it was book for twenty years) so with his Parliamentary career. The love of travel is always quadruin—nay, quintuple—that of other pleasures, and the reader always shares in the zest of the large measure of enjoyable. In this case an essay might be written on the vitality of delusions. For a long time, both in literary and political circles—I may be, very few ones—there has existed a feeling that Mr. Kinglake on first occasion Mr. Kinglake will do something great. There is a confident belief that he is in possession of the power to do so, and not what, and that it is only out of consideration for the nervous condition of his expectant devotees that he only once in a way drops out a great book which, should he slumber and not awake soon, will after the manner of conjurors, whose best tricks are worked out of the imaginative intelligence of the audience. It is a fact that this doubtless ingenious device with the amiable weakness of people who like to be tricked through their vanity, is the prelude to be about to reveal a wonderful discovery which he has made, of, say, some hidden stroke of policy of the Emperor of the French (it is a favourite device of his). How solemnly he adjures the immortal gods to bear him witness; how his voice falters, and his demeanour grows more and more reprehensible; how about it and about it he goes, until the audience is giddy with his circular talk; and then, at the exact moment of projection, there drops in hollow accents from his lips the portentous confession. When those who heard it read it next day in the grim reality of a Parliamentary report, they rub their eyes, and they are opened! Now all this kind of thing is a sort of confession one in a Session in the House of Commons; and, if so, what must it be in a little western borough? Prodigious!

It is not consistent with the purpose of these rude sketches to dwell on such demonstrations as that of Mr. Bright at Birmingham last week. That gentleman is his own painter, and his effects are so broad, and address themselves in such vigorous—we had almost said coarse—brilliancy to the whole world's eye, that they are unapproachable in a small and side-wind way. Mr. Schofield is a man of just such modest merit as to justify the weakest hand in an effort to draw him from the shade within which he is rather apt to retire; but in that place we have so recently said our little possible towards this end that all that suggests itself from his recent public appearance is a notion that he seems to think it necessary to act as a sort of buffer to his high-pressure colleague. If so, he is bolder and more adventurous than we thought.

Last week we ventured to allude to the self-election to the championship of the Army in the House of Commons; and characteristics have arisen since to induce us to say a word or two about a couple proceeding on the part of another member in regard to the Navy. Sir John Pakington has no doubt his prerogative as one of the Royal Navy in the Commons is Sir James Elphinstone, who, we believe, has always been in the service of the country. In this the course he has always taken in all nautical matters under discussion, Sir John has had strong reason to consider himself right in him to court the Navy; but during Lord Derby's last administration Sir James undertook to second the Address in answer to the Queen's Speech, and in that function he failed signally. In compliance with custom, he appeared in any such uniform as he was entitled to wear, and in this case it was so old, so like a fancy dress, and so unlike anything that anybody had ever seen, that, unless it was the regimentals of the Horse Marines, conjecture was baffled. It turned out that it was the uniform which he had worn in the service—the old but now extinct East India Company's marine. To this Sir James Elphinstone will be sure to cling as long as he can, being disinterested in any attempts he may make to get good done for himself, and consequently he will be a most powerful participate in its advantages, except, indeed, he has his eye on the secretaryship to the Admiralty with some future Conservative Government. He really came out very well in the Session, and the small specimen of New Hampshire members who congregated the other day—of all places in the world—at the Freemasons' Tavern to celebrate the birthday of Sir James Elphinstone, and to drink success to his future career, on the meeting afforded information of a pot, not probably generally known out of the Navy. And Sir Jervoise Clarke Jervoise is one of the members for South Hants.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of General Sir James Watson, K.C.B., of Wendover House, Bucks, was entrusted to the care of Messrs. Coutts and Co. Messrs. Watson, Reg., and John Watson, Esq., who are two of the residuary legatees. The testator bequeaths £1000 to the Royal Literary Fund, and attained the great age of ninety. Many of the legatees are also dead, the will having been executed in the year 1854. The testator directs that none of all his effects shall be sold, except the presentation-plate given to him by the Civil and Military Fund of Agra, and that the same shall be kept as a relic which regiment he was Colonel. There is a legacy of £2500 to a grandchild of the testator. The pecuniary bequests are very few in number, amongst the surviving ordinary legatees.

The will of the late Edward Beg., of Park Hill, near Stalybridge, which was proved at Chester, contains the following charitable bequests, viz.:—The sum of £1000 each to the Society for the British and Foreign Bible Society, £1000; London Missionary Society, £1000; Church Missionary Society, £1000; Wesleyan Missionary Society, £1000; Home and School for the Sons of Missionaries, £500; Manchester Royal Infirmary, £500; Manchester Royal Lunatic Asylum, £500; Blind and Dumb Asylum at Old Trafford, £1000; Manchester City Mission, £1000; Manchester Domestic Mission, £1000; Manchester Sunday-school Union, £1000; Bible Society, £1000. The trustees under the will are the Rev. Thomas Aveling, of Victoria, Mr. Aaron Andrew, and Mr. Frank Andrew.

The will of Mr. Thomas Wright, late of Kensington Gardenterrace, Hyde Park, was proved in London under £70,000 personalty. The testator, who died on the 5th ult., bequeaths £1000 each to the Royal Free Hospital, Orthopœdic Hospital, Samaritan Hospital, Asylum for Idiots, Society for Relief of Widows and Orphans of Medical Men, and Orphan Working School. With the exception of a few other legacies to personal friends, the remainder of the property is bequeathed to the Rev. Arthur Sumner, Hilary Nicholas Prisse, Esq., who is appointed residuary legatee.

It is announced that a submarine cable has just been successfully laid by Messrs. Glass, Elliot, and Co., between the port of Cagliari, in the Island of Sardinia, and the mainland, in Sicily, a distance of 120 miles.

The Havre journal talks of a diamond, just found by a negro in Brazil, far exceeding in dimensions the Koh-i-noor. It adds that Sambo refuses to dispose of it for any consideration short of his freedom.

Her Majesty has issued a new Order in Council, coming into force on the 1st of February, for the regulation of consular jurisdiction as among all British subjects and persons enjoying her Majesty's protection resident in the dominions of the Ottoman Porte, and for the better administration of a Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople, and of provincial Consular Courts in the provinces and dependencies thereof, and for the exercise and the jurisdiction and authority of the Consular Courts in civil and criminal matters; providing for the degree and nature of the punishment of offences of subjects resident in the Ottoman dominions in a register to be kept at the Consulate of every place where a Consular Court is established for British subjects dying in the Ottoman dominions, the punishment of offences against the law, religion, or customs of the country by British subjects, and for the issuance of foreigners against British subjects before the Consular Courts, and appeals for the Consular Courts to her Majesty's Supreme Court, and further grants authority to the Judge of the Supreme Consular Court to make rules and orders for the regulation of the practice of the Consular Courts, subject to approval by one of her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State.

TREATY OF COMMERCE WITH BURMAH.—Colonel Phayre has been appointed Envoy to the King of Burmah from the Governor-General. A treaty of commerce was signed in the Royal city of Mandalay on the 3rd of January, 1862, by Colonel Phayre, Commissioner of Pegu, on one part, and his Majesty the King of Burmah on the other part—that is to say, by Maha Nee Woon Mengyee Maha Thilawa Sithoo Thoodhamma Dhi Rajah, as Envoy and Plenipotentiary of the British Government; and his Excellency the Tsaya Dhi Kyoung Tsaya Dhi Mengyee Maha Bandoola, as Plenipotentiary of the Burmese Government. From native sources we learn that the following are the principal articles of the treaty:—The object is to promote the interests of peace and friendship between the British and Burmese Governments, and the high contracting parties agree to enter into free and unrestricted trade between their respective territories. Art 2. The King of Burmah engages to receive a British Commercial Agent at Mandalay, to allow all goods and merchandise to be imported and exported free of the payment of all duties. Art. 3. The British Agent, Mr. Benson, Commissariat, owing to the limited amount of its territorial revenue, shall raise a portion of the funds required for the maintenance of the British Commercial Government agrees to receive and recognise a British commercial agent at the Burmese capital.

PARAGUAY.—We borrow the following amusing details about Paraguay from the Standard:—"It is also interesting in order to show the flourishing state of free trade and free labour in that country. The total population of the capital of Paraguay, Assumption, is about 12,000 souls. The total population of the State amounts to about 700,000, comprising a large proportion of Indians and half-castes, Spaniards, Germans, and blacks, with very few foreigners. The commerce of Paraguay is insignificant, and yet it is the richest country in the world. Its principal export is yerba maté, a kind of cabbage, of the leaves of which are dried and reduced to powder, and which is exported, being much consumed in Brazil, Chili, and as a kind of tea. When the crops of maté are being gathered the Government sends officers to the country, and one-fifth is generally reserved for the Government, as well as the price to be paid for it; the remainder is left at the disposal of the proprietors. The Government sells its share to merchants at Assumption at a very large profit; but any private person wanting to export any part of it has to pay a heavy duty to the Government. The Government has a monopoly of tobacco, and it is to be had except by applying to the Government, which hires them out at a fixed price; so that, if a man wants to build a house, he must get his means from the state authorities, and even then he runs the risk of seeing them called off some day for the public service before his house is half finished, and he may have to wait months before he can get them back. Now the Government consists of the President, his three sons, and a daughter; and it is not surprising that with this system, no account being ever given of the public expenditure, the President's private fortune has grown to an enormous amount. He owns one-third of the houses in the capital, besides a large portion of the environs, without counting several large farms in the interior. The only public journal of the State, the Semanorio, is written by the President himself, so that when he is absent it does not appear. The eldest son of the President is the only General of the State.

THE FARM.

WAITS and strays are rare at this mid time of the year, when Mr. Wetherell's "Come away!" and Mr. Stratford's "Come along, Sir!" are hushed in the land, and they are as difficult to find as "diamonds in a dunghill." The weather, to the infinite delight of photographers as well as farmers, seems to be taking a turn; and, if wheat and barley are a bad yield, meat and wool play their part in "keeping the book account just respectable." From Ireland there comes the tale "we have had a great deal of rain, and many sheep have died of the rot in consequence; some favourable hours have been spent in making hay." How Cotswold of Mr. Cother's Little William bleed has pulled down the scales that have turned at 83lb. per quarter, and, last not, did, that the names "Lord Dundreary" and "Colleen Bawn" are ready to be run upon by contributors to the forthcoming "Blenheim Herd-book." A foreign chemist announces, in a new discovery, that the evening milk is richer than the morning; the editor of a medical paper opines that he ascertained that through his analysis of consumptives ten years ago; and a commentator is sure that he knew it at least twenty years ago. Mr. Garne, the eminent implement-maker, has been made a magistrate for Suffolk; and the Oxford Farmers' Club, which has been in a failing way, is inviting members to come in and, if not to subscribe, with terms.

The crop of calves at Warlaby this season numbers ten heifers and eight bulls; and out of these a white bull, by Lord of the Valley from Lady Grace (by Crown Prince, dam Specimen by Crown Prince) and a white bull from Campdowner (by Crown Prince, dam Vivandière by Buckingham), and a white bull from Secretary (by Sir Samuel, dam Truth by Crown Prince) are dead. Six of the other heifers are by Lord of the Valley, viz., a roan from Red Rose (by Crown Prince), a roan from Bride Elect (by Vanguard, dam Bianca by Leonidas), a red-and-white from Reception (by Crown Prince, dam Welcome by Water King), a roan from Lady Grace (by Crown Prince), a white (by Hopewell), and a red from Charlotte (by Crown Prince, dam Carolina by Bridesmaid). The bull calves we must add to the roan by Lord of the Hills from Melina (an own sister to Charlotte), a red by First Fruits from British Girl (by British Boy, dam by Leonidas), and a roan by Campdowner from Princess Royal (by Prince George, dam by Windsor). The bull-calf list includes two by Lord of the Hills, one of them a white (the latter also by Lord of the Valley from Queen Boadicea), and the other a roan from Soldier's Bride (by Windsor, dam Campdowner by Crown Prince). Lord of the Valley is represented by a roan from Red Rose, a white (by Crown Prince) from Bride Elect (by Vanguard), and Prince Arthur by a red and white from the Baroness (by Windsor, dam Queen of Oxon (by Crown Prince), dam Red Rose by Harbinger). The list presents a very appropriate and gratifying supplement to the sale of the Barrosa Shorthorns and Yorkshire hunters. Georgina's heifer dates Sept. 20; and, with the exception of the bulls from Soldier's Bride and Queen of the Ocean, which date Aug. 4, all the rest are from the end of June to after July 1. The white bull from Welcome was calved on June 30. The small number of bulls in the list of the Bull sold at Fitzdrews from Sweetheart, a purchase of Messrs. T. and J. Booth's, at Mr. Crawley's sale; and the calves of the past year consist of a roan heifer by Windsor (dam by Crown Prince own sister to Sweetheart), a red and white heifer by Knight Errant from Forest Queen, a red and white bull by Knight Errant from Queen of Troy, and a roan bull by Windsor from Heouba.

The Churchill Mount Farm has an entry of 32 to the credit of the past year—viz., 16 bulls and 12 heifers. The 12 heifers have been dropped since October 15 are all bulls save one. Eighteen out of the 32 are by Crown Prince, and the rest are by Royal Duke, Royal Arch, and Grand Arch. "The Harems" are nearly all roan and by Royal Arches, dated 1859. The statement that Scobell has "a yearling to his senior, Mr. Barnes's Dr. M'Isle, for the Farmers' Gazette and Sussex Advertiser, is not quite correct, as the latter Anchor Shorthorn sale is announced by Mr. Stratford, at Woodford Farm, near Thrapstone, by order of the executors of the late Mr. John York.

"The Duke of Pitlivet, the gold medal Devon bull at Battersea, leaves London on the 17th inst. for Somerset, and the herd at Cricket-St.-Thomas, Somerset, to which Mr. J. Davy and his neighbours, Messrs. Mayridge, Elson, and Hine, have contributed, is announced to be already fit for more than a prize of £15 each for Suffolk stallions and Suffolk mares and fillies, and for Shorthorn bulls and cows, Devon bulls and cows, and for Scotch breed, and equal amounts devoted to draybreeds. Amongst the entries are specimens of the Shorthorns reared in Great Britain, Ireland, and distinguished as for bulls under and over two years old, and as cows in milk and not in milk. The Ayrshires and Polled Cows or Ireland are so handsomely recognised; but the other English cattle breeds—Herefords, Sussex, Devons, Scotch, and Welsh—are all classified together, though with two equal prizes in each division, so that a Devon may win the first prize, and Devon would have to cope over the other in the judge's return. The sheep will include special places for Cotswolds and Leicesters, and for Southdowns and Shropshires and Down Britain or Ireland; for other short-wools, such as Shropshires; and for other long-wools, such as Lincolns and Romneys. The pigs are divided into classes for which small open to all countries, are allotted to large breeds, medium breeds, middlers, small breeds, and extra small breeds, and to the Berkshire and Suffolks." The grand prize, however, will be one of 50 thalers—or, in plain English, £7 10s.—for the best animal of any breed. There are several and medals to be awarded at the discretion of the judges for implements and machinery put in motion by steam power. Among the miscellaneous prizes are for agricultural produce of all kinds as to point an invitation to the best specimens of grain and seeds of the growth of the whole world himself. No other man's interest is strained so much, although, of course, in an international exhibition of agriculture, the interest is spread over a large, and agricultural sources best on the Continent; with yet more extended interest as the prizes are for "Agricultural Products, Vegetable, Animal, Mineral, and other cattle; as well as for Mexico, Meat, and other foreign sorts of sheep."

Lieutenant Powlett has drawn up an interesting report on a leper village at Tern-Tarn, in the district of Umritsur. Some fifty years ago Runjeet Singh built a village for lepers among the sandhills which abuse in the offerings was a large body of lepers who were employed as menials. The sufferers from this dire disease are not leprous; they are simply out of Greek Church, frequenting the churches like the other inhabitants of the country, and are allowed to mix freely with the people of the place. It is said though they are still reckoned a close apart from either the Wahhabians or the Sikhs, and that the latter sometimes inflict the sufferers. The Sikhs of Turkey many of the gipsy bands profess the Mohammedan faith. These people are the descendants of the Indian pariahs, and are considered outcasts, as well as the musicians of Servia. In the winter months they collect in the towns, and in the summer they move to more congenial haunts, and are chiefly to be found in the recesses of the forests. The girls are the handsomest of the women of Servia, and the boys are the children only, but the latter are not altogether unlike—wonderful models for the painter or sculptor.—Jones's "Servia and the Servians."

MUSIC

The SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY'S CONCERT at Exeter Hall on the evening of Friday, the 16th inst., drew one of the greatest audiences we have ever seen in that place. It was, indeed, so excessively crowded that an unseemly disturbance was caused by the clamorous complaints of persons who had purchased tickets which had been unable to obtain places. Such things might be easily prevented by limiting the sale of tickets, so as not to exceed the capacity of the hall. The performance consisted of Mendelssohn's music to Racine's tragedy of "Athalie" and Mozart's "Requiem." The former was the work which has been chiefly performed by the Sacred Harmonic Society, but, as yet, is comparatively little known to the public; the latter has long been an object of admiration and delight to every real lover of music. The circumstances attending the composition and production of "Athalie"—the last great effort of Mendelssohn's genius—are well known. Racine's celebrated play is denominated a tragédie lyrique, and belongs, in some measure, to the musical stage. Its dramatic denouement is such as is similar to the finale of a grand tragic opera. They are scenes in which assemblages of the people and the priests and attendants of the temple are introduced, and are written in lyrical measure, so as to be performed with choral and concerted music. Racine's famous tragedy was written for the purpose of being represented by the young ladies of Madme. de Maintenon's religious seminary at St. Cyr, but was afterwards brought before the public with all the "pomp of circumstance" of theatrical display, with all the splendour of music, scenery, and spectacle. It has been said that the music was composed by the celebrated Lulli; but this is a mistake, for Lulli was dead before the date of the production of the play. At all events the original music, whoever was its author, has been long since lost and forgotten. In the year 1846 a German version of the tragedy was brought out at Berlin, with music composed at the desire of the King by Mendelssohn. It created a great sensation in Germany, and attracted the attention of our late lamented Prince Consort, who caused the same performances of the music to be given at Windsor, before a great assemblage of the Court and the aristocracy, on Tuesday, July 1, 1851. In the autumn of 1852 the performance of it was given by the Philharmonic Society with so much effect that it was repeated, by command of the Queen, at the subsequent concert. A pretty narrative of these incidents of Athalie, written by Mr. Bartholomew, Mendelssohn's well-known friend and confidant, was published by the late Mr. Bartholomew's sons, and was introduced in their proper places. When the music came to be performed by the Sacred Harmonic Society, the same plan was adopted, and, as the vocal music of Mendelssohn is of the most elaborate kind of the 16th inst. was the most complete and magnificent that ever has been given of the work. The solo parts, all written for female voices, were sung by Mrs Parepa, Mrs. Netherclift (late Miss Fanny Rowland), and Miss Banks Dolby. The instrumental verses were recited by Mr. Phelps with such beauty and variety of elocution that his fine declamation repeatedly called forth bursts of applause. The choruses were grand in the extreme, and the instrumental music displayed all the powers of the superb orchestra. The noble overture in purloined, and the "March of the Priests," one of the most martial strains ever imagined, were executed with wonderful vigour. The whole performance, in short, was most exciting, and the audience by the vehemence of their plaudits, evinced their admiration and delight. Of the divine "Requiem" of Mozart—that work of such awe-inspiring purity and the deathless fire of the immortal musician, uttered, as it were, with his latest breath—it would be impossible to say more than that it received on this occasion justice from the performers. The solo parts were exquisitely sung by Miss Parepa, Mme. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Weiss; and the execution of the choruses was the perfection of power, delicacy, and expression.

The MONDAY POPULAR CONCERT of the 19th inst. was as numerously attended as usual, but was scarcely up to the high thought) of the usual interest. The two concerted instrumental pieces, generally selected from the works of very eminent masters, were by composers of only secondary rank. The concert opened with a quintet for the piano and stringed instruments, by Schumann. The second part began with a violin sonata by Spohr, which, to the merits of three musicians there is much difference of opinion, but no one will say that Spohr is there is a Mozart, a Beethoven, or a Mendelssohn. They were, however, admirably executed. Herr Pauer being the pianist and Mr. Sainton playing the violin. The other instrumental pieces were a romance by Viotti, charmingly played on the violoncello by Piatti, and Beethoven's sonata in C minor for the piano and violin, performed by Pauer and Sainton. The chief attraction at this concert, we believe, was the presence of Mr. Sims Reeves, who sang the celebrated "Lord of Burleigh, and the ballad, "Tom Bowling all your hearts," from "Elijah." Miss Banks sang "Where the bee sucks"—not the exquisite melody of Arne, but an air by Mr. Sullivan, a young Irish violoncellist, who has the professional merit of the beautiful words of Shakspeare.

Our first spring drama, Midlle, TITENS, made her first appearance at Nayo, on the 6th of this month, in the character of Lucrezia Borgia. Her début created a sensation—a furore—which, according to every journal, has never been equalled from the days of Malibran. The vast theatre of San Carlo was crowded. Everybody—for continental audiences of 3,000 at least—thing or anybody on trust—received the stranger in silence; but she had not uttered many bars of her first pathetic air, when a storm of applause burst with Italian vehemence from every part of the house, and continued during the whole opera. She was twelve times called before the curtain, and each time was greeted with new acclamations. The voice of the public was echoed by the journals three or four of which we have seen. All of them are enthusiastic and rapturous. Some of them are able and intelligent critics, whose descriptions of her person, her acting, her vocal powers, and the Italian purity of her style. During the present month pay at the San Carlo seems to caution several remarkable performers, among Stichla, the prima tenore, who is described as a young singer of great merit. Armandi, too, whom our readers will remember at Her Majesty's Theatre, has been received with favour in the character of Manrico, and such lesser parts as Ferrando is said to be singer than an actor. The stage arrangements, however, are very defective, and the orchestra miserably supported. In short, for a musical correspondent of great eminence writes to us, "that people who are accustomed to the Italian Opera in London would go to Italy. They would soon hear with what sort of rubbish they must be satisfied."

We learn with satisfaction that Mr. HENRY JOHN LINCOLN, whose localities in Operatic overtures excited so much admiration at our musical circles last season, is about to deliver, at the Russell Institution, two lectures on "The Genius of Bach and Handel," illustrated by the performance of pieces selected from the instrumental music of these great masters.

The ship John Williams Montrose, 200 tons, from Newcastle for Lisbon, foundered at sea on Jan. 8. Her crew were landed at Fouzon.

The North Pacific Review, a monthly literary journal of considerable merit, with illustrations, has been started at San Francisco.

The claims of Mrs. Chisholm have been brought before the New South Wales Assembly on a proposal for granting that lady £3000 as a gratuity. There was much opposition shown to the proposition on the ground that Mrs. Chisholm was poor and did; that she had done much to assist immigration; and that as great personal benefit to promote the moral and religious welfare of the young women who position on arrival was no promotion and unnatural.

The New South Wales Magazine for the month of the distinguished Hungarian Governor Kossuth, who have been serving in the army of Italy but the Hungarian Legion, have arrived in this city, intending to offer their services in any capacity to the Government of the United States in its contest with the rebellion. A son of Mme. Bottini, another sister of the ex-Governor, has also entered our service.

The first important step towards establishing a medical school in Victoria has been taken in the foundation of a lectureship of medicine at the Melbourne University. It is to be hoped (says the Melbourne Argus) that this will be followed up in the foundation of other lectureships of surgery, &c., so that the young men of the colony may have an opportunity of qualifying themselves here for the practice of the various branches of the medical profession, without being compelled to go to England for a qualification. The first lecturer appointed is Dr. Embry, on "Materia Medica."

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A COMPETITOR.—The committee of the Problem Tourney have determined, we understand, to reserve Mr. Campbell's name from the list of problems (which appear rather hard upon that admirable composer), and to substitute the prizes that—Mr. Cecil Hare's three in the field, and Mr. Healey's three in two moves, Mr. Medley's, and the Rev. G. R. Arthur take "C." and "D." in the order.

J. H. S. (Bath).—Your solution of the Combined Mayety prize problem, No. 932, is perfectly correct. Look to the end of Caxton's book for the solution, which was published in English by the gentleman first given and the following:—

J. M. A.—As regards Problem No. 933, one might always be "W. to D." &c. 2. You are quite correct in your solution of the Problem No. 934. Look at it again. 3. We have not room for it to-day, but you have a second problem safe. Look to it.

D. C. T.—Yes, it reads very like it; but the beautiful work of Mr. Pigrim was not a forgery. Mr. Pigrim, Mr. Cecil Hare, and Mr. Healey, are all right.

C. P. H., Bury.—You will find it can really be accomplished in three moves, incredible as it may appear.

"W. Vinton.—A right reply to be forwarded. We agree with you that the problem competitors in the late problem tourney have just reason to complain of the negligence of the judges and referees. Some of the problems sent in were palpably bad; but you are wrong in speaking of that committee as an English jury. The majority, if not the whole, of the committee were foreigners.

TACTICUS.—Glad to see the Congress so promising to be nearly ready, but have not yet had it announced for publication.

G. F. B.—Mr. Jaenisch will not be satisfied after by 1. P takes Kt (ch), &c.

G. F. B.—As obvious mate in three moves.—B. to K 3rd; B. K to K 3rd, and Rook mates.

LAURENCE, Dublin.—We are replaced that the second set of five problems sent for the committee of the late Congress was vigorously opposed at the only meeting where its presentation was entertained, and by Mr. Staunton, Mr. Löwenthal, Mr. Horwitz, Mr. Kling, and America.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

A COAL-OIL PYROMETER, invented by Mr. G. Tapliabue, was exhibited at a meeting of the Franklin Institute, Philadelphia. The vessel containing the coal-oil, the quality of which is to be tested, is placed in a reservoir of water which it heated by a small spirit-lamp. A thermometer, the bulb of which is immersed in the oil, indicates the temperature. Examples in the 30 of the vessel containing the oil are provided with lids, which are replaced at a proper time to admit atmospheric air, which, combining with the gas generated with the oil, forms an explosive mixture. A taper is introduced from time to time into a tube projecting from the top of the vessel, and when the gas and air have combined in the proper proportion the mixture is ignited by the taper and explodes, the point at which the thermometer at the instant of the explosion indicating the quality of the oil.

LIFE IN THE DEEP OCEAN.—We read in the Proceedings of the Natural History Society of Boston, U. S., an observation of Mr. Macrae, in regard to deep-sea soundings, that a Norwegian naturalist had recently obtained, by means of the same instrument used by Messrs. Brooke and Dr. Wallich, between Cape North and Spitsbergen, living animals from at 96 fathoms. The temperature at the bottom was 32°. Little depth, more or less, temperature was only three-tenths of a degree centigrade nearly the freezing point), were found living animals of various species, principally the highly-coloured crustaceans. The same naturalist had found annelides (probably the same) and echinoderms between 1,000 and 1,200 fathoms (probably also at Spitsbergen.

THE PRESENCE OF CHOLESTERINE (the fatty matter of bile) has been determined in various vegetables by M. Boudet. He states that, after congealing the hard yolk of egg, coconut substance, red jelly, and other substances of an animal origin, for thirty-six hours in alcohol, at a temperature of from 20 to 40 degrees centigrade, and then evaporating the alcohol, there remains a residue which he has named "myeline." M. Boudet shows that this substance is a very characteristic one, and proposes to show that it is to be found in several vegetables, especially peas, in several species of grain, and even in olive oil. M. Boudet is continuing his researches on this interesting subject. —Journal de Pharmacie.

THE AMERICAN PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY.—The suit of the city of Philadelphia against the above institution, claiming to tax the latter, has been decided in favour of the society. Our readers will be interested in reading the concluding words of the judgment given by Judge Read:—"It is the president of this society was the originator of the first fire company, the first public library, the first hospital, and the first academy, now the University of Pennsylvania; a signer of the Declaration of Independence, Minister to France, and the first President of the society who signed the original articles and the definitive Treaty of Peace between the United States and Great Britain; and, during the whole period of his life, a distinguished citizen of United States." This was Dr. Benjamin Franklin, the patriot and the philosopher; and it is pleasing to reflect that the city and State of the United states of which he was so distinguished an ornament will never permit the hands of the taxgatherer to disturb the roof of the hall in which the society has met for every part of the world, both in peace and in war, and belonging to a society of which he was the founder."

A NEW FORM OF SULPHUR was lately shown at a meeting of the Academy of Sciences, Paris, by M. H. St. Claire Deville. He had received it from a young German chemist, M. Dissenbacher. By adding to pure sulphur a small quantity of iodine, or even a few thousand parts of iodine the sulphur was made perfectly soft, so that it might be spread in thin leaves, as flexible as leaves of gold or tin. It is probable that it contains the sulphuration of indiarubber. When pressed in the hand, the modified sulphur acquired a certain degree of hardness.

THE VINEGAR EEL (Anguillula aceti) is the subject of an interesting paper by Mr. Jabez Hogg in the last number of that pleasant periodical the Microscopical Journal. It appears that the animal was observed in corn and described by T. Needham so far back as 1744, and afterwards by other naturalists, however, with many erroneous notions respecting them. In one grade of corn flour found "seven full grown and a hundred young ones still in existence." In many cases, after the meal was placed in water they were seen twisting and wriggling about like so many tadpoles." Mr. Hogg then describes the species of Anguillula as A. tritici, of blighted corn; A. aceti, of vinegar, or any substance undergoing vinous fermentation; and A. glutinis, found in paste, almost everything the same as the A. aceti; and A. fluviatilis, found in waste waters among decaying vegetable matters. A. aceti is said to be found in the leathery and dilated viscera of cancers, not in the strong vinegars sent out by respectable manufacturers. Mr. Hogg appends to his paper a plan for examining the animal in various phases of its life. We regret to learn, by the conclusion of the paper, that the experiments, in the midst of which he was called into an instrument to alarm the minds of learned hypochondriacs, who are shown by the writings and by the unlearned knowledge of others, in which shows us that there is no fluid or solid in nature free from the rudiments of animal and vegetable organisms, and that they will continue to flourish in favouring conditions arise, as is shown in the case of boiled distilled water.

CHEMISTRY OF STEEL.—A paper on this subject, by M. H. Caron, has been laid before the Academy of Sciences, Paris. He had, he said, remarked that when unlicensed steel is acted on by acids a substance resembling graphite is left remains, and is not present when steel fused is substituted. This substance, he stated, was a compound of six atoms of carbon and one of iron. Berthier had found the same substance, which he said, not completely dissolve it, separated another carburet of iron. M. Caron states that, after many experiments, he has not been able to obtain this carburet of iron, and hence is compelled to conclude that it was probably only a mixture of carbon and metal, in which the latter was mechanically protected by the former against the dissolving action. Nevertheless, he hopes that his experiments will throw some further elements to be considered in the determination of the true state of the carbon in steel of different qualities. He subjected, 1st, steel to the action of chlorine, which had no effect; 2nd, submitted to prolonged hammering; and, 3rd, tempered steel—to the action of hydrochloric acid, and heat, digesting the mixture in hydrogen. The graphitic substance, when taken from the acid, was washed, dried in a stove, and weighed. It was found to consist of dissolved steel of each kind he found the following resultsum :—

	1st.	2nd.	3rd.
Iron	0·937	0·945	traces
Iron	0·937	0·945	traces
	1·000	1·045	0·060

Thus, the effect produced in a complete manner by tempering is found to be partially realised by hammering, and totally annihilated by annealing. The conclusion to be drawn from the experiments of the opinion generally entertained that the larger the amount of carbon separated by the acid the less hammable is the combination. It remains for further experiments to subject we must refer our readers to the Comptes Rendus of the Academy.

THE GEODESY OF THE CONTINENT.—At a recent meeting of the Academy of Sciences, Paris, M. Laussedat presented the following proceedings consequent to the conference between the Governments authorising the connection of the three parts of Germany with the object of determining the triangulations of Germany and Italy; the dual result to be the measure of an arc of the meridian extending from the Shetland Isles to Malta, and the construction of a series of arcs or parallels to a scale, by means of this great meridian. M. Laussedat's report on the progress of the opinion generally entertained that the larger the amount of carbon separated by the acid the less hammable is the combination. It remains for further experiments to subject we must refer our readers to the Comptes Rendus of the Academy.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURE.

JOHN MARSHALL, Esq., F.R.S., the new Professor of Anatomy, commenced his course "On Animal Mechanics" on the 20th inst., when he considered the sources and sources of animal power and motion. Our body, he said, was—making use of the lever, pulley, and wedge; governed by mind acting through nerves. It moves by muscular power, and muscular power is chiefly found in the highest animals and even in lowest kingdom. This muscle is formed of primary and secondary fasciculi, or bundles, and is composed of 70 parts water, 18 fibrin or syntonin, 2 albumen, and 2 of fat and salts. It possesses nutritive, sensory, and motive properties. It absorbs oxygen and gives off carbonic acid, and undergoes a real process of waste and repair. Its contraction is effected by a change in the arrangement of its particles, which are shortened in one way and widened in another. Its contractile power and its power of developing a current of electricity were shown in the limbs of frogs. The remarkable phenomena attending muscular contraction, physical, chemical, and electrical, were described and illustrated; and the various theories as to their nature and cause discussed. Professor Marshall expressed his opinion that rigor mortis, or stiffening after death, was due to chemical change rather than to the last dying act of muscular contractility, as thought by some other physiologists.

THE NEWTOWN AND MACHYNLLETH RAILWAY, NORTH WALES.

THIS line is twenty-three miles long from its junction with the Newtown and Llanidloes, at Moat-lane, to Machynlleth; but the company has running powers over the Newtown and Llanidloes line to Newtown, making the aggregate length about thirty miles. At about a mile and a half from the junction the line reaches Caersws, formerly a very important Roman station, and still of great interest to the antiquary. It then proceeds along the valley of the Carno until it reaches the highest table-land of Montgomeryshire, and passes through the wonderful cutting at Talerddig, of which we give an Engraving, from a photograph by Mr. W. Ward, of Newtown. This is one of the most wonderful cuttings in the world, the solid rock being cut to a depth of 126ft. At first a tunnel was contemplated, but the idea was abandoned because the rock afforded excellent building stone, in which the neighbourhood is deficient, and the stone was used in the construction of the bridges, some of which are of an extensive description. After leaving Talerddig the line crosses an immense ravine by an embankment and a bridge, the latter spanning the Aberyswith road at an elevation of nearly 90ft. The country in this place presents a picturesque appearance, and as the railway does not descend into the narrow valley, but runs along the side of the hill, the traveller has an excellent opportunity of seeing the beauties of the scenery, which offers new and attractive features at almost every point. By a series of heavy embankments and bridges, the line at length reaches the valley of the Twrynyn, about a mile beyond Llanbrynmair. Following the course of the river for some distance, and crossing it no less than five times, the line stretches away to the beautiful valley of the Dovey, along whose banks it winds its way into Machynlleth station, which is placed at a few hundred yards from the town itself, for the purpose of effecting a junction with the Aberystwith Railway. Amongst the more noteworthy works on this line we ought to mention a magnificent bridge over the Twrynyn, at Tyrrhos, consisting of three arches; its extreme height being 70ft. from the water to the level of the rails. The line is laid with double-faced rails, chairs, and patent signals; and the cost, with permanent stations, &c., is about £10,000 per mile.

This railway was formally opened at Machynlleth on the 3rd inst. by Countess Vane with a few apposite remarks. Her Ladyship said:—"Ladies and Gentlemen,—About four years ago I had the pleasure of cutting the first sod of the Newtown and Machynlleth Railway; and I need not, in proceeding formally to open the railway, express the sincere gratification which it now gives me to be present on this happy occasion and to wish prosperity to the undertaking. May it fully realise the expectations of its promoters; may it tend to the development of the neighbourhood, with which I have been connected since my earliest days, and in which I feel the deepest interest. I will not trespass longer on your time except to declare to you the welcome news that the Newtown and Machynlleth line is now opened." Addresses were also given by Earl Vane, Sir Watkin W. Wynn, the Marquis of Blandford, and others. The proceedings were pleasantly relieved by the presentation of a silver spade by Mr. Davies, the contractor of the line, to Countess Vane, "to commemorate the cutting of the first sod of the railway by her Ladyship on the 27th of November, 1858."

The day was kept as a high holiday at Machynlleth, and the quiet little town looked quite gay with its display of arches and evergreens.

COLLISION AND FOUNDERING OF THE LIVERPOOL AND LA PLATA.

On the 6th inst., the London and Liverpool steamer Liverpool and the barque La Plata, bound to Lima, were lost, through coming into collision off Point Lynas, in St. George's Channel. Happily not a life was lost, both crews having time to lower the boats and get away before the vessels went down. The subjoined depositions of the master of the Liverpool, and of the chief officer of La Plata have been taken on oath:—

Captain Wm. Charlesworth, master of the Liverpool steamer, states:—We left London on the 30th of December. The steamer was brigantine-rigged, 180 tons gross register, and belonged to Messrs. T. A. Tamplin and Co., of Liverpool. She was iron-built, and classed in Lloyd's register. Her crew mustered twenty-three hands, and there were three passengers. We called in at Plymouth and Penzance, and at 10 p.m. of the 6th we were off Point Lynas, which bore S.S.E., three-quarters of a mile distant, the wind blowing fresh from the S.S.E. The steamer's course was S.E. by E., when a light was seen right ahead, about half a mile distant. We ported our helm, which put her head S.E., and in about four minutes afterwards the helm was put hard aport, until her head was S.S.E. The other vessel (which proved to be La Plata, from Liverpool) starboarded her helm; and, seeing that a collision was certain, I stopped and reversed the engines full speed. We had stopped her way, and the engines were reversing when the barque struck us on the port midships with great force. Finding we were fast sinking we got the boats out, and took the passengers and crew safely put into them. Soon afterwards she went down. We were picked up by a schooner, and landed the next morning at Holyhead.

Mr. Enos Faulkener Mackintosh, chief officer of the barque La Plata, was in charge of the watch at the time of the collision, states:—The ship was bound to Lima, with a general cargo, consigned to different merchants in Peru. She was built of iron, 275 tons register, and the owners were Messrs. Imery Tomlinson, at Liverpool. We left Liverpool on the 6th, at 9.50 p.m. On that day the ship was lying three miles off Point Lynas, bearing S.S.W.; the weather was hazy, with a fresh breeze from the S.E. The course we were steering was N.W. by W., when a light was seen right ahead. At first it seemed to be a fixed light, and we expected it was that at the Skerries. About two or three minutes after ten o'clock we saw the light a little on the starboard bow, as also a green light, which proved to be the steam-ship which had recently crossed the barque's bows, and immediately starboarded the helm a little, and directly I had done so I saw the steamer's three lights and her red and bright light. Seeing a collision was inevitable, if not quickly prevented, the helm was put hard aport. After this was done some person in the steamer shouted out to me to port the helm, but in another minute the vessels came into collision, the barque's bow striking the steamer in the main chains. The barque's fore compartment was stove, and immediately filled. We took to the pumps and endeavoured to keep her afloat, but she sunk about ten o'clock in the morning. We were picked up in our boat by a steamer.

Captain Pearson, of La Plata, estimates the value of her cargo (chiefly general goods) at £30,000, and the ship at £5000. Captain Charlesworth values the Liverpool steamer at £20,000, and her cargo at £40,000. The loss will chiefly fall on the underwriters.

PRIVATE THEATRICALS AT BERLIN.

THOUGH the habits and customs of different nations are rapidly giving way to one general mode of life, still there remain in their social features certain idiosyncracies. As with the Spaniard bull-fighting, with the Englishman the prize-ring and the turf, have an interest for the great body of the people, so there is in Germany the theatre. The theatre mania seems to be thoroughly mixed up with Teutonic flesh and blood. In Berlin, for instance, besides numerous unlicensed amateur theatres, which during the winter time open their doors to their admirers, performances take place in the families of the wealthier classes on birthdays and numerous other festival occasions. Our Engraving on page 104, from a drawing by Mr. Ludwig Leeffler, of Berlin, represents the preparation of one of these latter performances. In the family of a banker is the poor but cocksomical Baron, the favoured admirer of the daughter—in the front groups, in the other groups to the right and left the preparation, the arrival, &c., are represented.

PRUSSIA—WHAT NEXT?

MOST practical men, we apprehend, would prefer to live under a Despotism rather than under a Constitutional Government in which the Constitution is not permitted freely to work. In the former case an inevitable evil may be, if not accepted, endured, in the hope that endurance is only for a while; but in the latter, as the promise is kept to the ear and broken to the hope, the most irritating condition of social and political life is present to a people who feel that if they wish to exercise undoubted rights they may have to struggle for them. Something like this eminently unsatisfactory state of things has existed in Prussia ever since the reigning Monarch began to rule by what he believes a Divine right of his own, instead of that delegation of authority which was represented in his regency for his brother. The nature and progress of the contest between the King and his Chambers on the issue of constitutionalism which has been going on for some time is so well known that it is not necessary to recall its events to remembrance, beyond stating that at one time it seemed as if his Majesty had determined to try his chance of conducting the affairs of his kingdom without any legislative or representative body at all. It did not, however, quite come to that, and the reassembling of the constitutional estates of the realm has been marked by a step on the part of the Chamber of Deputies which advances the struggle another stage, and one so decisive that it is not easy to see how it can be carried on any further in its existing mode. If the Address to the King which has just been proposed is presented to him (and there seems every reason to suppose that it will) the only alternative is the yielding by his Majesty of the points in dispute, or his assertion of absolutism, followed by an attempt to abolish the Constitution. Labouring, as he appears to be, under a species of political dementia, it is not at all improbable that this will be his next proceeding; and after that, unless the spirit of the people of Prussia is grievously misrepresented in the Chambers, the contest must take another form, at the nature of which it is only necessary to hint.

The ground taken by the Deputies is unimpeachable; and if, as is well believed, they are supported with singular unanimity by the country, they cannot possibly yield an inch of it. Conscious, and properly conscious, of the constitutional trust which has been committed to them, they have, with a rare union of courage, firmness, and moderation, resisted a series of assaults upon the Constitution, which was won by efforts of another kind; and the Address, which has been voted by a large majority, may be taken to be their ultimatum. As it is composed, it combines all the qualities which such a document should possess; and it leaves neither to the King nor to themselves any loophole of escape from its requirements. It begins by laying down that which the deputies believe to be their undoubted duty at once to the Crown and the Constitution—that of stating fully and without reserve the actual condition of the realm; and it then proceeds to propound distinctly a series of violations of the Constitution, nominally by the Ministers, but in reality by the King. It is one of the essential provisions of the Constitution that the Chambers should vote a Budget for each year prospectively, and in the Address complaint is made that the Executive withdrew from the consideration of the Chambers that of 1863, and had incurred expenditure which had been not only not provided for, but objected to and refused, by a representative assembly, whose first right was thus neutralised and set at nought. This paragraph of the Address is eminently suggestive, and in no measured terms declares that the voting of expenditure is a right which is the foundation of the constitutional life of States, which is therefore guaranteed by all existing Constitutions, and which, hitherto constantly recognised by the Government of Prussia, has been as constantly exercised by the Representative Chamber, and it goes on with the significant words—"the country, seeing with alarm resolute attempts to destroy the Constitution and arrest its political progress, stood by its representatives." In, if possible, still bolder language, the Address informs his Majesty that an abuse has been made of the power of the Government such as occurred in the dark years preceding his assumption of the regency (the implied comparison between the acts of the Regent and the King is a home-thrust); that civil officials, and more notably those who at the same time were deputies, have been visited with annoying oppression for the loyalty they evinced to the Charter, while the press has been prosecuted for the advocacy of constitutional rights. The Charter, it is declared, is openly violated by his Majesty's Ministers; and it is asserted that the new fession of the Chambers has been commenced without any real overtures being made by the Government, and without even the slightest prospect being held out of the restoration of the orderly conduct of public finance, and the carrying back military arrangements to a legal basis. Reminding the King of his recent declaration, that he will maintain the Charter which he has taken an oath to conserve, these admirable exponents of the feelings of a people which seeks to enjoy only a rational and sensible condition of freedom conclude by saying that their position as the chosen representatives of the people imposes upon them the imperative duty of declaring, solemnly and deliberately, that peace at home and authority abroad can only be restored to Prussia by a return to Constitutional Government. It is hardly doubtful that Englishmen will recognise in this bold and able manifesto something of the spirit which influenced their forefathers when they were battling for the political rights which the Prussians, in the most legitimate mode, are now asserting; and that the well-considered and well-conducted efforts which that people are making towards an assimilation of their institutions to our own will meet with universal sympathy in this country.

It is to be observed that in all the observations and arguments of an Address which is a vindication of and a demand for the preservation of Constitutionalism, one of the fictions of Constitutionalism is rigidly adhered to, inasmuch as all the recent acts of the Government are attributed to the Ministers, and not to the King himself. Admitting fully the judicious propriety and the tact of this course on the part of a Chamber which is calling for the preservation, pure and simple, of the law by which it exists itself, we do not for ourselves keep within the same limits when we are treating of the matters in dispute; and therefore we do not hesitate to express our conviction that this practical impeachment of the Prussian Ministers leaves the heads and alights in full force upon the King himself. There is nothing which can be urged in defence of

A bill has been introduced in the House of Representatives for the enlistment of 150,000 negro troops. The resolution to lay the bill upon the table was defeated by 83 to 53.

Mr. Spaulding, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Representatives, has explained the financial situation of the Government. He said that the Government needed immediately 150,000,000 dols. All the gold and silver in the banks of the loyal States was 87,000,000 dols. Banks could not be sold. 1,117,000,000 dols. were required, in addition to the receipts from the customs and taxes, to carry on the Government until July, 1864. It is necessary to borrow, per month, 100,000,000 dols., every day, Sundays included, between this time and the 1st of next July. Mr. Spaulding declared that the only hope of success in raising money for the expended upon military sources. Congress has passed a bill for the issue of 100,000,000 dols. in legal-tender notes. The Missouri Emancipation Bill, which provided an appropriation of 10,000,000 dols., has been reported back by the Judiciary Committee, with a recommendation that it be inexpedient to pass 20,000,000 dols.

MR. DAVIS'S MESSAGE.

President Davis's Message has been sent in to the Confederate Congress. He complains that the Powers above declared neutrality without acknowledging the sovereignty of the seceded States; thus injuring the South, and prolonging the war by admitting the doctrine that the Federal Government had a right to coerce the seceded States. If these States were independent, the refusal to exclusively the interior navigation of the waters with them as well as the ocean, no matter what may have been the motive prompting it. He does not complain of any foreign power for recognising the United States Government for the abolishment of privateering, although the prohibition to either belligerent to the use of its property by privateers, coupled with the more severity against the South, by depriving her of the only means of maintaining, with some approach to equality, a contest on the ocean.

He declares the anxiety of the South for peace, but says that its determination against subjugation remains unchanged. He denounces the conduct of the Union armies as atrocious and cruel. Referring to Mr. Lincoln's emancipation proclamation, he says he has only to say that it is the instinct and common humanity of men of all countries to pass judgment upon a measure by which millions of unoffending and inferior race, peaceful and contented in the relations of their sphere, are doomed to extermination, while they are encouraged to commit atrocities which the inevitable consequence of insurrection to servile violence unless in self-defence. Commissioner Federal officers attempting to exercise the functions assigned to them by the proclamation will be regarded as the death with severity against the South, by depriving her of the only means of maintaining, with some approach to equality, a contest on the ocean.

THE ARCHBISHOP-ELECT OF PARIS.

THE long list of the Archbishops of Paris increases rapidly. Selected from the elite of the French clergy, they have only varied in the degrees of their distinction; yet it would seem that of late years each metropolitan prelate has vied to excel his predecessor in the exercise of those Christian virtues which ought to characterise all ecclesiastical dignitaries. The last three especially have left behind them imperishable souvenirs, from the purity of their lives and the peculiar circumstances attending the "closing scenes" of their worthy careers. The year 1848 will remember the death of Monseigneur Affré on the barricades at the very moment he was endeavouring to bring Parisian barricades at the very moment he was endeavouring to bring Parisian barricades at the horrible strife of a fratricidal revolutionary struggle; in 1857, Monseigneur Sibour fell by the hand of a priestly assassin while in the exercise of his religious functions in the church of St. Etienne du Mont; and now, in 1863, the Lord Archbishop and Cardinal Morlot is at his post, but with a purse so completely empty that all he had to dispose of in the way of a legacy was his empty title and he had to dispose of in the way of a legacy was his empty title and he had to dispose of in the way of a legacy was his empty title and

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS,
LONDON: SATURDAY, JANUARY 31, 1863.

We have to record another diplomatic incident in the history of the American War. The Emperor of the French has despatched a despatch of importance to be sent by his Foreign Minister to M. Mercier, who represents France at Washington. It has been called "officious" by the French journals, and it remains to be seen in which of the two senses attaching to the word the American will interpret the interference—"officious" implying, according to their own Noah Webster, "kind and obliging," and also "intermeddling in affairs with which one has no concern." Certainly, so far as externals go, there is nothing in the despatch of M. Drouyn de Lhuys to offend the most sensitive nation in the world. The Emperor does not offer mediation, he does not even offer to interfere; but he dwells upon his friendship for the United States—upon the pain he feels in witnessing the raging war; declares that he takes all susceptibilities into account, and merely makes suggestions for a negotiation. He does not ask that the war may be discontinued while such negotiation is in progress. On the contrary, he reminds the North that soldiers may go on fighting while civilians are debating, and that the cessation of strife may be contemporaneous with the adjustment of terms. But he urges that conferences might be advantageously held between the belligerents, who, instead of mutually accusing one another, might discuss the questions which separate them. This, he represents, would involve no humiliation, would exclude the idea of alien pressure of any kind, and would simply be a practical investigation into reciprocal grievances.

If the Emperor had to do anything, it is difficult to say that he could have done less or put his points more graciously. There has not been time to hear how the despatch (a copy of which was to be left with Mr. Seward, if desired, according to usage) has been received in America, and it is very hard to speculate upon the course which this strongly-commented upon and called the American people will take upon any given subject. The American organs here are uninstructed, and are of course fumbling in the dark while compelled to say something; but, not knowing to say that may not be repudiated by the next mail, their trumpets give a very uncertain sound, for they themselves know not whether to blow the signal for battle. But, on the whole, it appears to be thought that the proposal of the Emperor will be declined, partly on a ground to which his Majesty himself adverts, and partly on a plea which, obstinate and pedantic as it is, represents an idea that is not to be ignored by the Federals. The first and chief obstacle is to be by the Emperor is the hope and belief of the North that it is conquering the South, or will be able to do so. His Majesty is too courteous to point out the futility of this notion, or to represent that the North, having been beaten in nearly every important engagement, and its armies at this moment occupying the most disastrous attempts upon the principal strongholds of the South, the signs of the war cannot be read favourably for the Federals, even by the most resolute of their prophets. He passes this by, and he also abstains from dwelling upon the second difficulty. The North declares the Confederates to be "rebels," and on the ground of their recognising them as belligerents; and as the doing this must be the first step towards a pacific conference it does not seem very probable that Mr. Lincoln or his Cabinet (two distinct agencies, as the President is unceremoniously told by some of his subjects) will be induced to venture upon a measure much unusual than popular. So that although, as we have said, anything like prediction as to the course of the American people would be very hazardous, there does not seem to be any great likelihood of the olive-branch appearing in a French hand.

We have also to hear what the South has to say. President Davis has been again addressing his people, and his tone is, as usual, temperate but resolute. He complains that the European Powers have refused to recognise privateering, and thereby have prevented the Confederates from availing themselves of the results of their naval prowess, and he affects to regard this step as a mere subterfuge, inasmuch as the North has refused with justifiable exultation to the successes of the Confederates, and adds that their enemies are now feeling the pressure and hardship which the Slave States have borne so bravely. His note is naturally one of continued defiance. Supposing that Washington should be moved by the representations of the Emperor—and we may here observe that some of the Northern journals think that it would not disgrace the Federals to be the first to suggest proposals—it is perfectly certain that in the present temper of the South the very first demand upon the subject of slavery would be one that would set the still powerful Secession party in a red heat. The slaves of the States in revolt are as free as a piece of paper can make them, and it is said that a great number of Virginian slaves have actually availed themselves of the notification of New-Year's Day. At all events, upwards of a million of human beings have been proclaimed free men. The very first article to be submitted to Conference by the South must run in this way:—"The proclamation to be rescinded, the negroes to be formally restored to slavery, and all blacks who may have availed themselves of the decree to be given up to the former owners, under respective States." Will the Abolitionists bear that? For assuredly nothing lies will satisfy the victorious Confederates; and, unless the Washington plenipotentiaries—if such persons can exist—enter the Conference-room unprepared to assent to this article they had better stay at home. It may be that the South would concede a good deal in return for this article, and for a second which should reaffirm the desirability of slavery and re-enact it for the Confederate States; for it would be absurd to suppose that the "Chivalry" are not as tired of the fratricidal war as the "Yankees;" but is it possible for the Abolition party to concede this nullification of themselves, this retractation of all that they have been so clamorously saying for the last eleven months?

Finally, we may observe that, with recent successes and even in the face of the disaster at Murfreesboro', the tone of the South has become firmer and firmer, and it is even more emphatic than ever in its exultation at the prospect of being freed from the yoke of what it calls the greedy, hard, usurious Yankee. In a word, the South is bent upon the experiment of standing alone, and it is impossible to refuse to it the right of trying that experiment. If the Conference can act upon the principle of separation, it is, of course, the natural method of terminating a hideous strife; but, if not, we fear that the Imperial suggestions are not worth the paper on which they are written; unless, as is not impossible, they may be intended for rejection, and this rejection may be intended to be regarded as a vindication of another step of a different nature.

It is stated by the Observer that Mr. Gladstone will be able, on "the Budget night," to announce an increase of income to the extent of £3,000,000, and that the expenditure for 1863-4 will fall below that of 1862-3 by "more than two millions."

The whole of the mails and the entire cargo of the Colombo were recovered by Rodwell's diving apparatus.

The Bishop of Quebec died at Quebec, on the 8th inst., at an advanced age. He preached on Christmas Day in his cathedral, but was suffering from a cold. Congestion of the lungs came on, and caused his death.

The Rev. Dr. Bullock, Principal of Lennoxville, has arrived at Montreal on the Royal Military Asylum, Chelsea, on the 28th inst., in the province of a large number of the clergy of the district and officers of the institution.

We understand (says the Times) that Convocation will meet at the Chapter House, St. Paul's, on the 19th inst., when business of merely formal business it will be adjourned till the next day, then to meet, as usual, at Westminster for the despatch of ordinary business.

The newly-elected Archbishop of York was confirmed on the 28rd inst. in the parish church of St. James, Piccadilly. A great number of the Bishops and clergy, in addition to the usual personal congregation, were present. The ceremony having been duly performed and oaths taken, his Grace was fully invested with all the ecclesiastical rights appertaining to the see of York.

The following is the list of preachers appointed by the Bishop of London for the special services at St. Paul's Cathedral during the ensuing month:—Feb. 1, the Rev. W. W. Champneys, Canon of St. Paul's; Feb. 8, the Very Rev. R. Payne Smith, Dean of Canterbury; Feb. 15, the Very Rev. Lord Arthur Hervey, Rector of Marylebone; Feb. 22, the Rev. Hugh M'Neile, Canon of Chester.

No notice had been served on the 24th inst. to take the appeal on the part of the Rev. Rowland Williams, D.D., to her Majesty in the Privy Council, and therefore the sentence of Dr. Lushington, the Dean of the Arches, will stand, and the reverend gentleman will receive the monition and judgment of costs.

An important and influential deputation waited within the last few days upon the two Archbishops and the Bishop of London, at their respective residences, to represent to these dignitaries the necessity for a combined organisation of clergymen and laymen throughout the metropolitan area of the Church of England. Most of the laymen in the deputation stated that they belonged to no party, but were members of the Church of England by conviction, but they felt that it was useless to guard in from without unless its action was impressed from within. Nonconformity, they said, increases the number of clergymen in the Church till their numbers were adequate to the spiritual oversight of the whole population; and then the Church would best be accomplished by beginning with some manageable district—say a rural deanery—where the most pressing necessities of the case may be prepare and supplemented by the liberality of the district. The three dignitaries to whom the deputation addressed themselves highly approved of the scheme, and of the plan of attaining of it and cordially promised the promoters all the assistance in their power.

THE UNIVERSITIES AND PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—At Oxford Mr. Philip E. S. Hollond, from Brighton College, has been elected Exhibitioner of Worcester, and Mr. Henry Tootell, from the Maidstone Grammar-school, elected Exhibitioner of University. The latter will be an election to a Fellowship at Emmanuel on the 8th of February, open to such as have passed all the examinations required for B.A. degree. The Lumley Professorship of Anatomy and Physiology (Dr. Rolleston, Pembroke College), will commence a course of lectures on Feb. 2. He also proposes to lecture for practical instruction, as in former terms.

At Cambridge the Examination for the Chancellor's Medal for Legal Studies will commence on Feb. 16, in the Senate House. The Margaret Professor of Divinity will begin his lectures for the present term on Feb. 10, in the Arts School. Subjects:—1. Augustine de Doctrinâ Christianâ; 2. The Pastoral Office.

The Rev. B. C. Caffin, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Worcester College, Oxford, has been elected by the Dean and Chapter of Durham to the Second Mastership of Durham School; the Rev. C. R. Holmes, M.A., to be Vice-Principal of the Oxford Diocesan Training College, Culham; the Rev. J. R. Major, M.A., to be Head Master of the Grammar-school, Carmarthen; and the Rev. F. H. Dendrevth, to be Second Master to Charterhouse School, London. The Principalship of the Theological College, Exeter, (established through the munificent donation of £20,000 by the late Bishop of Exeter), which has become vacant owing to the elevation of Dean Ellicott to the bishopric of Gloucester and Bristol, has been conferred upon the Rev. Edward Harold Browne, B.D., Canon of Exeter, and Norrisian Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge.

FINE ARTS.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has graciously signified his intention to inaugurate the Memorial of the Great Exhibition of 1851, upon which Mr. Durham, the sculptor, has been so long engaged, and which is to be erected in the gardens of the Horticultural Society. The ceremonial will, no doubt, be rendered very effective. It is to take place on the 6th of June next, the anniversary of the opening of the Horticultural Society's Gardens.

Mr. Frith, R.A., the popular painter of "The Railway Station" and "The Derby Day" pictures, has received his Majesty's commands to paint an elaborate picture of the approaching marriage of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales with Princess Alexandra of Denmark.

There is being exhibited at Messrs. Jennings's Gallery, Cheapside, a very large and elaborate picture of "The Solemnity," painted by Mr. Salmon, an artist already known to the public for his large panoramic representations of ancient Jerusalem, somewhat in the style of John Martin. The present work exhibits the old city at a distance an interesting view of the holy city, with the noble and numerous edifices of Herod, and the more ancient walls and monuments, all restored, of course, according to classical analogy or the descriptions or allusions of Josephus and other ancient writers. The whole of the foreground is occupied with the great and terrible drama of the Crucifixion. Small or large, there are said to have been some fifteen hundred figures. Science has to render his version more complete, strained probability to the very utmost, in order, it would appear, to crowd into his picture every personage mentioned in the sacred narrative, although some of them are only mentioned long anterior to, and not at all in connection with, the Crucifixion; and also certain personages and incidents only known to Romish tradition, and, as it is called, "Christian Art;" such, for instance, as Saint Veronica and her volumen. The moment intended to be represented is that when Christ exclaimed, "It is finished!" The bloody darkness is about to be swept away by a gush of daylight, cleaving it, and one single woman, pinning it and falling on the alone beneficially illumines the drooped cross. The two thieves on each other, guilty and innocent, the Redeemer and the redeemed. The scenic effect, the view of the city, and the multitude of figures produce a rather imposing impression on the spectator. The fabulous of the artist must have been long and arduous. But we regret very much to say that the picture offends against most of the canons of sound criticism and good taste. The figure-drawing is throughout faulty to the extreme; the false colouring is showy to vulgarity; and the composition and pictorial arrangement have not, in fact, been difficult to imagine that one single portion of the foreground, at least, has been painted with anything approaching an intelligent sense of the irresistible awfulness of the theme, or with anything more than the most unreasoned desire to produce a strong melodramatic and "sensation" picture. Some of these faults may be corrected in the engraving which, we understand, is to be made from this picture.

The picture of "Mary Queen of Scots Escaping from Lochleven," which we engraved in our Number of the 3rd inst., was painted by Signor Vannutelli, a rising young artist, who belongs to an ancient Roman family.

ARTISTIC COPYRIGHT.—A meeting took place on the 28th inst. at the rooms of the Water Exhibition, Pall-mall, for the purpose of inducing the Government to take into consideration the improvement of the law of artistic copyright. The Act of last Session has in particular been found, in several recent trials, to afford no adequate protection to the artist, protection against the pirating, by photography and other means, of engravings from his works. The chair was taken by Mr. Graves, the chairman of the society of Arts, and the meeting was attended by a deputation of seven members of this society, who have taken up the question, and have been unanimously—1st. Moved by Mr. Gambart, and seconded by Mr. Lucas, that the law of copyright in pictures as recently amended by the their works having been now acknowledged by Parliament in numerous Acts, beginning with the reign of George II. and ending with the last Session, it is expedient, in the interest of the public as well as of artists, that the law should be made effective for the protection and encouragement of Art. In the course of his speech Mr. Gambart referred to the various forms which piracy took, and read examples of which were then exhibited to the meeting; these, particularly the means of producing facsimiles afforded by photography, the time-destroying, and the expense, were very formidable to artists, and it is not easy to distinguish the reproduction from the original; and, as they require little skill to produce, involve in the commission of the crime but little, at as much lower rate than the original, yet afford no remuneration to the artist, they were very prejudicial to his interest, and therefore ought to act. 2nd. Moved by Mr. Hawse, and seconded by Mr. J. Dillon,—That it appears unnecessary and inexpedient to encourage piracy by permitting it to possess the same privileges as are given by the 25th and 26th Victoria to publishers of [illegible]. We may remind the reader, as the Government prosecutions before a magistrate, that the Act referred to specifies paintings, drawings, and photographs, but appears to overlook engravings, the object of an engraving has his "invention"—especially if, as is often the case, the engraver has been employed by the artist to engrave from a pictorial combination which, we understand, has been formed. 3rd. Moved by Mr. Graves, R.A., seconded by Mr. Redgrave, R.A.—3rd. Moved by "That, in order to rescue the art of engraving from the destruction with which it is threatened by infringements of copyright, it is desirable that the offence of making, selling, exhibiting, or in any way dealing in [illegible] of which the original engraving is protected by copyright, be a matter of justice of the peace." This last clause is the usual formula, but in analogous cases one of imprisonment is added with the option of a fine. The letter bearing on this resolution from Mr. Frith, R.A., was then read. 4th. Moved by Mr. Graves, and seconded by Mr. Redgrave, R.A.—4th. NATIONAL SPORTS.

EIGHTY-NINE out of the 170 horses named have accepted for the Chester Cup, and on behalf of Asteroid (5st. 4lb.) Sir Joseph Hawley says "Content." Ivanhoe (4 an absentee, and is advertised for sale at £1200; and Ben Webster, 8st. (the winner in 1851), who was supposed to have quitted the turf, is sixth on the list. There are some very tempting weights below 7st. 12lb. and 7st. 2lb. Ivanhoe (8st. 4lb.) is at the top of the acceptances for the Northamptonshire Stakes, which number forty-five out of a hundred, and Asteroid (9st. 5lb.) heads the list in both the great Epsom handicaps, for which the acceptances will be cut immediately. The celebrated Melbourne, at Oulston's paddocks. Young Melbourne's subscription is full; but Kettledrum will not be advertised this year. Mr. Jackson and Colonel Townley, and, in fact, the whole racing world, the loss of young Bullock, the jockey, will be a very severe one. In three days' time Wednesday morning's telegram, "Bullock is dead," will seddom that we have had a union of such uniform civility, careful conduct, and high saddle talent. Indeed, no more gentlemanly horse keeper than Colonel Townley to ride Kettledrum for the Derby brought him quite to the front rank, and his riding of The Whaller last season, in five of his great races, gave him a chance which, with his light weight, 7st. 4lb., he knew well how to improve. It is very singular, by the way, and, in any alliment connected with their profession, but since Frank Butler died in 1856, the jockey mortality has been unusually heavy. Aldcroft was hunting a very few days before his death, of which an abscess in the throat was the cause. He was a Northumbrian by birth, and was buried at Ulgham on December 31. Simon Dutton, a well-known Yorkshire speculator of the old school, died last week, leaving a nice fortune. Sir Vincent Cotton, one the great coursing men of the day, and the patron of "everything in the ring," has also not lived long into the new year. Although only sixty-two, he had been considerably paralysed for some time past. Cricket, as habitat at Lord's can testify, was the pastime the love of which seemed to stick by him to the last.

The unfortunate cricket split between Nottingham and Surrey continues; and there seems to be no chance of an eleven from the Surrey Club hold a match—if then. We cannot exactly say whose doing it is (although George Parr gets all the credit); but, by a strange perversity, all England and the Surrey Club are the important and rich clash in six most important dates. Mr. Jackson has written to us thus with a view to our remarks of last week. "Tarrant, Mortlock, Carpenter, and Tarrant, shall play any three men in England at single wicket for a thousand, or any part of it. There is any place in the South, I have no doubt a match can be made." It is to be hoped that some one will take up this characteristic defi from "The Squire of Orna." Surely Mr. Jackson will not stand in the way of Tarrant's to beard the Cambridge trio. The gate-money alone at such a contest would be good hedging, if the proprietors of Lords' or the Oval would pick up the bets. The Myra monument is closed, and one fifth of the £100 is to be expended in a monument in Thurnham churchyard, within the rate as to encumbrance for some decayed Kentish worthy.

Harry Andrews, with 250 yards start, won the Five-mile Handicap on Monday. At Hull, Lang, and Tarrant, the seven-mile match at Derford stopped before the last round, and Lang and Mills made a dead-heat of it. The latter pair run for £25 a side and the ten-miles cup at Derford on Monday. Mr. Mortlock and the Rev. Mr. Derford (who have altered the terms of their original match) run ten miles, level.

Mr. Spinks's success with Sea Foam at the Altcar Club has increased the confidence in his kennel for the great day.

Join hands at Waterloo.

Old Sea Flower won a Plate at the same meeting, in which Corporal, 1st-him-he-esy (sire of Agility, a great Waterloo favourite), Sweet Briar, Roxy Morn, and some other good "has-beens" were beaten. Leicester Club is fixed for Tuesday, Dec. 31; Bridgwater and Longtown for Tuesday and Wednesday; Ridgway Club for Wednesday and Thursday; Harrogate for Wednesday; Notts Club, Thoresby for Thursday; Hereford (O) for Thursday, Friday, and Saturday; and Great Haywood for Friday.

Our Melbourne correspondent's account is all that can be wished, and that the sport has been a good average. The Duke's dividend on to a couple of races at Sprendlingen, and a very fair thing to ground in ten minutes, and had a very fast thing to ground near Three Queens with the other. The Hon. Messrs. Bertram have arrived, with Mr. Mostyn Mostyn's nose in leadership. The Cheshire hilled after a splendid fifty minutes, without a check, from Wrexham Gore on Thursday. They have not had a faster thing for years.

Intelligence has been received from the Cape of the total loss of the William, from Singapore to London, when all perished with the exception of two boys and a Lascar out of a crew of forty-two.

Sir Henry Barkly, the Governor of Victoria, at a recent meeting of the Acclimatisation Society in that colony, stated that the llama, magpie, and canary had been successfully introduced, and he thought that measures were in progress for the speedy introduction and acclimatisation of rooks, partridges, rooks, hares, sparrows, and starlings. The fig, the deer, cashmere goats, and black partridges from India; and ostriches, pheasants, guinea-fowl, and antelopes from the Cape of Good Hope.

The great iron floating-dock built at Sourabaya, Java, from the designs of Mr. R. T. Thomson, C.E., was successfully floated into the basin on the 23rd of November last. The difficulties in the way of such an immense structure were evaded by building it in a kind of dam made on the beach, which, when the dock was complete, was cut away, and the water let in from the sea; the sea, rushing in, lifted the dock from blocks on which it had been built. It was then towed into the basin, and the water pumped out, the masons docking ships for repairs by the end of December last.

A letter in Florence states that a commission has just been formed, under the presidership of the Mayor of that city, for establishing a national museum of the middle ages. The nucleus of the idea for it is the Bargello Palace, formerly the State prison, and all the necessary arrangements have been already made. The museum will comprise only objects of every kind in the Fifth Palace. The expenses of the establishment are to be defrayed from the budget of public instruction.

The Levant Herald of the 14th inst. says :—"Yesterday 400 riflemen of the 11th Regiment practised target-firing in presence of the Sultan. The result was very satisfactory. Their commander, Colonel Hobart Pasha (who not one of the whole succeeded in hitting the bull's-eye at the easy distance of 200 yards. His Majesty has consequently given orders that the whole of the Infantry troops forming the garrison of the capital shall be kept at frequent ball-practice till a decent proficiency has been acquired."

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

FURTHER large amounts in bullion—about £600,000—having been withdrawn from the Bank of England for export purposes, the directors, on Wednesday, raised the rate of discount to seven per cent. The step was one which was immediately followed by a corresponding rise in the value of money in all other quarters, and the lowest rates for the best commercial paper are now as follow :—

Thirty days' bills ... 6½ to 6¾ per cent. | Four months' bills ... 7½ to — per cent.
Sixty days' bills ... 6¾ to 7 per cent. | Six months' bills ... 7½ to — per cent.
Three months' bills ... 7 to 7½

The demand for accommodation has been very extensive, even at the above quotations, and of our continents appear to be of opinion that capital is likely to relieve higher in price. In the Stock Exchange money is now worth from 4 to 6 per cent, and the joint-stock and discount houses are giving 4 per cent for capital at call, and 6½ per cent if with seven days' notice of withdrawal.

In addition to the amount withdrawn from the Bank, the whole of the recent imports of gold from America have been taken for France.

The total arrivals of the precious metals this week amount to £340,000, chiefly from New York, whence we learn that the quotation for bankers' bills had risen to 102, and the premium on gold to 59. These are the highest rates current during the present war; nevertheless, they are in favour of bullion shipments to this country.

On the Continent money is becoming dearer. We annex the rates in the leading cities :—

	Bank rate per cent.	Open market per cent.		Bank rate.	Open market.
Paris ...	3	2½	Amsterdam	4	3
Vienna ...	5	4½	Berlin ...	5	4
Trieste ...	5	4½	Brussels ...	3	3
Frankfort ...	5	4½	Hamburg ...	5	5
			St. Petersburg	5	5

The steamer for the Rut has taken out £315,419, partly in gold.

The forthcoming dividend of the English, Scottish, and Australian Bank will be at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, carrying forward £4189 to the reserve fund.

Vice-Chancellor Wood's decision, in the suit of the London and County Bank against Mr. Eyre, has been confirmed by the Lords-Justices. The bank, therefore, will lose about £100,000; but the amount has been provided for.

No change of importance in the rate of money has occurred in the discount market for National Securities. Prices, generally, have given way, although the sales of stock for money have not been to any very momentous. Joloss Stocks, &c., have continued tolerably firm. On Monday Consols, for Money, sold at 93¼ ¾; for the Account, 93¾ ¼. Thursday's quotations were New Three per Cents, 92¾ ¾; Exchequer Bills, 6s. to 7s. prem.; Bank Stock, 8 to 9 prem.; India Stock, 220 to 225; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 92¾ ¾; The Debentures sold at 100¾, and the Bonds, 11s. prem. Prices were rather lower on Friday. Consols for Money sold at 93¼ ¾; for the Account, 93¾ ¼; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 92¾ ¾; Long Annuities, 13 1-16; India Stock, 220 to 225; Bank Stock, 8 to 9 prem.; Exchequer Bills, 6s. to 7s. prem.; Consol Bonds, 10s. prem.; India Bonds, 10s. to 12s. prem.; Five per Cent Stock sold at 108¾ to 109; and Bank Stock, 8 to 9 prem.

The market for Foreign Bonds has ruled steady, and the quotations have undergone little alteration. Turkish and Spanish Bonds are the only exceptions in value. Brazilian Four-and-a-Half per Cents have marked 94¼; Egyptian, 97¼; Mexican Three per Cents, 34; Ditto, New, 33¾; Portuguese Bonds, 44¾; Ditto, Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 91¼; Ditto, Three per Cents, 45; New Granada, 24¾; Ditto, Land Warrants, 1¾; Peruvian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 79¼; Ditto, 1862, 44¾ ex div.; Ditto, Three per Cents, 1853, 67¾; Ditto, Deferred, 19¾; Russian Bonds, 91¾; Ditto, Four per Cents, 1862, 91¾; Spanish Three per Cents, 39¾ ex div.; Ditto, Deferred, 16¾; Ditto, Passive, 5¾; Ditto, Certificates, 7¾; Turkish Six per Cents, 1858, 71; Ditto, Small, 71¾; Ditto, 1862, 67 ex div.; Venezuela Six per Cents, 17¾; Ditto, Deferred, 6¾; Ditto, Three per Cents, 12¾; Austrian, 57¾; and Italian Five per Cents, 65¾ ex div.

The following quotations were conducted in Joint-Stock Bank Shares and the following are the leading quotations :—Agra and United Service, 9¾; Australasia, 46¾; British North America, 41¾; Chartered Mercantile, 21¾; Ditto, Bank of Queensland, 8¾; Chartered Mercantile of India, London, and China, 41¾; Chartered of India, Australia, and China, 21¾; Ditto, New, 21¾; Commercial of China, 21¾; Ditto, 91; English, Scottish, and Australian Chartered, 21¾; Hindustan, Peninsular, and China, 6¾; London Chartered of Australia, 37; London Joint-Stock Bank, 14¾; London Chartered of Australia, 37; London and Anseatic, 8¾; London and Brazilian, 23¾; London and Hanseatic, 8¾; London and Hong-Kong, 8¾; London and Middlesex, 2¾; London and Northern, 3; London and South American, 3¾; London and Westminster, 5¾; National Bank of India, 10¾; National Provincial of England, 39¾; New, 3; Ditto, 21; Provincial of Ireland, 8¾; Royal British Bank, 1¾; Union Bank of Australia, 23¾; Union Bank of British South Africa, 10¾; Union of Australia, 50¾; Union of England and Australia, 10¾; and Union of London, 21¾.

Colonial Government Securities have been in but moderate request :—Canada Six per Cents, 1877, 110¾; Ditto, 1878, 110¾; Ditto, 1884, 110¾; Ditto, 1885, 110¾; Cape Six per Cents, 109; Mauritius Six per Cents, 111¾; New South Wales Five per Cents, 1867-82, 107¾; Ditto, 1871-88, 107¾; Ditto, 1872-97, 107¾; and Victoria Six per Cents, 110¾.

The Miscellaneous Market has ruled steady, as follows :—Ironclad Steam Canada Land, 80; Ceylon Company, 1; Crystal Palace, 3½; Electric Telegraph, 6½; Ditto, Preferred, 6½; Ditto, Deferred, 3½; Ditto, Extension, 1; National Discount, 9; Peel River, Land and Mineral, 54; Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation, 12½; Ditto, New, 12½; Royal Mail Steam, 10½; Ditto, Preferred, 140; Royal Mail Steam, 87; Submarine Telegraph Scrip, ½; Ditto, Shares, 6½; Ditto, Preferred, 6½; and Submarine Telegraph, 6½.

Considerable inactivity has prevailed in the Railway Share Market, and the best prices of the day for Investment Stocks and Preference lots announced at the rate of 3½ per cent. The following are Thursday's official quotations :—

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE, Jan. 27.—The show of English wheat in to-day's market was again limited; nevertheless, most kinds moved off slowly, at barely last week's prices. We were not supplied with foreign wheat. Good and fine samples realised full prices, but the inferior qualities ruled heavy. Floating cargoes of grain supported late currencies. Malting barley was in fair request, at full prices. Grinding sorts were dull sale, at 1s. per qr. less money. Malt was in slow request, at 1s. per qr. less money. Of oats, we had a large supply. Although the trade in some instance, the currencies advanced 6d. per quarter. In beans and peas very little was doing, at last week's rates. Flour was dull.

Jan. 28.—The demand for all kinds of produce was in a sluggish state. Compared with this day se'nnight, wheat was 1s. per qr. lower.

Jan. 29.—Barley, malt, oats, beans, and peas, unchanged. Flour was 1s. lower.

ornamented with two black guipures, the lower one placed horizontally upon the skirt at a certain distance above the fluted flounce on the edge, of the same material as the dress, the upper one en guirlande. Square corsage, with guipure plastron. The corsage itself and the sleeves are richly trimmed with narrow black guipure. We call attention to the peculiar gracefulness of the coiffure in this evening dress, which is so carefully drawn as to enable us to dispense with further description.

Fig. 4. Head-dress.—This fourth figure, in the second plan, is given merely to show the latest style of coiffure for a ball or a soirée. The front hair is arranged on each side in two rolls, and carried behind so as to pass through the back hair and still leave a ringlet to fall forwards. Artificial holly, with red berries, furnish the ornament indicated in our Engraving. The back hair forms three thick rolls, fastened by an amber comb.

LAUNCH OF THE DUBLIN TRINITY YACHT PRINCESS ALEXANDRA.

THE launch of this beautiful little vessel, the first built in the Thames bearing the name of the future illustrious consort of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, took place at Blackwall on the 20th inst. A deputation from Dublin was expected to have been present on the occasion, but the boisterous weather of the preceding night had prevented their arrival. The honours of the naming, &c., were gracefully and efficiently performed by Miss Margetson, daughter of one of the directors of the company; and, as the Princess Alexandra glided with a gentle motion into the water, hearty cheers were given by those assembled. Apart from the motive of paying respectful homage to the future Princess of Wales by naming the steamer after that esteemed lady, there is something like a claim to Danish names for vessels built in the yards of the Thames Ironworks. It is but a short time since some gun-boats, the first in the Danish fleet, were built at, and launched from, those works. These boats carry plates of 2½-inch thickness, and a layer of felt is interposed between them and the iron skin of the ship. They have a light draught of water, carry three guns—one amidships and one at the stem and stern—and steam easily eleven knots an hour. In every point for which they are designed they have perfectly fulfilled the intentions of the Danish Government, and are justly regarded as the most valuable vessels of the kind in the Danish navy.

As an example of the immense amount of armour-plated vessels constructing in this country for our own and other Governments, we may notice what is doing at these works alone.

After the launch of the Princess Alexandra the company, among whom was a large number of ladies, were conducted by Mr. Bolt and Captain Ford over the extensive foundries and forges of the company, and they courteously directed the attention of the visitors to an enormous frigate now building in these works for the Spanish Government. This vessel is pierced for 36 guns, is of 4800 tons burden, and is to be fitted by Messrs. Penn and Co. with engines of 1000-horse power. She will carry armour-plates of 5½in. in thickness, upon a backing of 9in. of teak, or the same in this respect as the Minotaur, now building by her side in the same yard. Close by the Spanish frigate a monster battery is in course of construction for the Russian Government. She has an enormous snout, like the head of a hippopotamus; her tonnage is 2800 tons, and is intended to carry 26 guns. Her plates are of 4½in. iron. She has been specially designed for small draught of water, hence her peculiarly ugly sides. When complete, and with all her stores on board, she will draw only 14ft. of water. In another part of the yard an ironclad has been commenced for the Turkish Government. This war-vessel is only a shade smaller than the Spanish frigate, being of 4500 tons against 4800. The armament and plating are similar to those of the Spanish ship. The engines, of 900-horse power, are in course of construction by Messrs. Ravenhill and Co. In this one yard there are now building four armour-plated ships—the Minotaur, for the British Government; the Victoria, so named, we may suppose, out of compliment to our own gracious Queen, for the Spanish Government; one for the Russian; and a fourth for the Turkish Government. Add to these that the company have undertaken to complete the Valiant for our Government, and that they are making the sternposts and iron plates for the Royal Sovereign, the Achilles, and several other ironclads, and some notion may be formed of the busy scene which the forges and foundries of this extensive establishment presented to the astonished and delighted visitors. It is expected that the Russian battery will be launched in April, the Minotaur in June, and the Valiant in July. The Spanish and Turkish frigates will be ready for launching next year.

The Princess Alexandra is designed by Ash, and is of the following dimensions:—Length, 176ft.; beam, 24ft.; depth, 14ft. 6in.; her engines, by Messrs. Penn and Co., are of 180-horse power.

MEET OF THE WEST NORFOLK HOUNDS AT HOUGHTON.

THIS beautiful Norfolk seat of the Marquis of Cholmondeley, which is thirteen miles from "the pleasant town of Lynn" and ten from Fakenham, was the scene, on the 21st inst., of the Prince of Wales's second meet with the West Norfolk hounds. Houghton is not unknown to fame. Sir Robert Walpole built the original house in 1676, and in his zenith he was wont to hold there, for a fortnight annually, "the Congress" of Ambassadors and Ministers of State. It is also remembered by poulterers and farmers' wives as the place where the £500 wager was made, between Lords Orford and Rockingham, to match five geese to walk five turkeys from Norwich to London. The present house stands low in a flat park, with fine beech woods and beautiful gardens, and was built in 1722-33. It has a centre 166ft. square, and at each angle a cupola and a lantern, with wings connected by a Tuscan colonnade.

The meet took place immediately in front of the house, and "the Congress" was worthy of the occasion. At eleven o'clock his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and his Royal Highness Prince Louis of Hesse, accompanied by Captain Grey and Mr. Knollys, arrived in the Royal carriage. After the usual courtesies had been exchanged between the Prince and Mr. H. Villebois a movement was made to one of the park covers, where a fox, after being very nearly "chopped," went to ground. Mr. Coldham's cover at Anmer produced another, which gave them a capital fifty-minutes' ring in the open, and so back to Anmer, where the hounds checked. Harris, the huntsman (once first-whip to Clark when Mr. Morrell was master of the Old Berkshire), hit him cleverly off, when "Charley," with great politeness, put his head straight for the Prince's residence at Sandringham Park, and the hounds were whipped off at West Newton, within a mile of it. Prince Louis of Hesse did not leave the carriage; but the Prince of Wales went in a style which would have delighted his celebrated tutor, Mr. Davis, who still "goes like a boy" in his seventy-sixth year. His Royal Highness has made foxhunting "a great fact" in Norfolk at last.

Testimonials of the highest character from eminent professors. Illustrated prospectus on application to BOOSEY and SONS, 28, Holles-street, London.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

THE works in connection with this great undertaking have lately attracted so much attention that a brief account of a recent visit to them, accompanied by some Illustrations of the progress of the works, cannot fail to be of interest to the public. Besides the cutting of the rigole, or trench, for the ship canal between Lakes Menzaleh and Timsah, an account of which has recently appeared in this Journal, the efforts of the company have been directed to the cutting of a lesser canal for the supply of sweet water to Port Said, the Mediterranean entrance of the intended maritime canal, and to Suez, its other terminus.

This fresh-water canal, to which the attention of our readers is for the present mainly directed, commences at Zagazig, and receives its supply of water from the El-Mashurifeh Canal, which flows direct from the Nile from a point a few miles north of Cairo. From Zagazig to Tel-el-Kibeer the company have merely deepened and repaired the existing El-Wady (the Valley) Canal, the ancient Arsinoe. From Tel-el-Kibeer the actual works of the company may be said to commence. The new canal is about 20ft. wide on the water line, and 6ft. deep; it is completed, and open for navigation as far as Lake Timsah, where it branches off in opposite directions, and is intended to run parallel with the maritime canal. This work is, therefore, being pushed forward with vigour, and it is hoped that before the end of the present year Suez will be supplied with an abundance of sweet water.

The effect of opening out this canal through the Wady Tumilat is already perceptible in every direction. A vast extent of land, which a few months back was a dreary wilderness, is now being brought into a high state of cultivation. Every inundation will add considerably to this already valuable territory, so that, with ordinary care, it will realise, in a few years, all the capital expended upon it. As an instance of what good management can effect, the district of Ras-el-Wady, recently purchased by the company from his Highness the Viceroy, and of which only 2000 acres were under cultivation last season, has been so transformed that at least 5000 acres, it is said, will be the result of the present year's improvements in irrigation, or 150 per cent increase of the proceeds over last year.

Further in the interior more time will be required before the soil can be ready for farming. At present small crops are raised by the Bedouins, who only wait to gather it in and then move off to other climes. The company seem to be on excellent terms with these gentry; and, indeed, putting aside the injustice of the labour system, all the labourers are well cared for, and, as far as one can see, do not appear at all miserable.

The Illustrations in connection with the Suez Canal which appear in this week's Impression are from the pencil of Mr. Frederick George, of Cairo, who has forwarded to us the accompanying particulars of a trip on the fresh-water canal taken by him last month:—

Having been favoured by Count Sala, vice-president of the company, with a letter of introduction to the agents on the route, I lost no time in getting together a few necessaries and making the best of my way to Benha, a station twenty-nine miles from Cairo, on the Alexandria line, joined by my friends; then proceeded by a branch line to Zagazig, the terminus, about forty miles from Cairo.

Arriving at what is called the station, but of which nothing can be seen but mountains of cotton bales awaiting transport, we did at length find the way out, and, clear of the railway, could draw breath and look about us. Zagazig is a considerable town, and at this season is in a state of great commercial activity. Struggling through the crowds in the bazaar, we crossed three bridges, which span as many canals, which here form a junction, and give quite a Venetian aspect to the picturesque old town. From its central position and its being in direct communication with Alexandria and Cairo by rail and canal, it has risen much in importance of late. There are several factories for cleaning cotton in and about the place, into one of which, belonging to our fellow-countrymen, Messrs. Acland, Mitchell, and Mustapie, we hurried, and happily in time for a delightful dinner. Being refreshed, we called upon Mr. Wilkinson, the company's agent, at Zagazig, who courteously placed at our disposal a boat, with dromedary to tow in case of need.

We were here fortunately joined by a gentleman connected with the company, Mr. Paponot, who accompanied us to Timsah, and to whom I am much indebted for valuable information and attention during the trip.

Everything being prepared, we took leave of the agent and our friends and started at 2 p.m. Sometimes sailing with a light breeze, sometimes being towed, we reached Tel-el-Kibeer, the first station, about nightfall, having passed on our way many beautiful little bits of scenery and some busy villages, among which I must not forget Abou Hamad, where the company have substituted a serviceable wooden drawbridge for a rotten old stone erection of Mohamed Ali's time. Here and there we passed groups of women filling their water-jars, men irrigating land, with the simple "shadoof," or basket, suspended on a lever. This portion of the valley is very fertile and well populated.

Finding it would be impossible to continue the voyage by night, as there was no moon, we put up at a neat little hotel at Tel-el-Kibeer. The company have recently made some very fine gardens here, which supply the whole of the works with an abundance of every kind of vegetable and fruit. There is also a drawbridge, similar to that of Abou-Hamad.

There is a telegraph-station here, in communication with all the stations at the works. The system is the French dial telegraph (Bréguet's). The operator was good enough to explain to us the mechanism.

Leaving Tel-el-Kibeer at daylight, we continued our way now fairly on the actual works of the company. Four hours' sailing brought us to Lake Mahsamah, where there is a station. The lake is small, but full of fish, and apparently the resort of numerous flocks of wild fowl and geese. Good shooting can be had about there. A solitary heron stalked about the shrubbery which everywhere dotted the surface of the lake. A species of flamingo has been seen here at times.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF FREDERICKSBURG.—THE ATTACK ON MARYE'S HILL.

THE attempt of the Federals to carry the first of the Confederate positions on their right—the battery of the Washington Battery, on Marye's Hill, commanded by Colonel Walton—was, as our readers are aware, totally unsuccessful, and most disastrous to the assailants. Immense masses were buried at the foot of the hill and works, shown in our illustration; but at each attack they were driven back with immense loss. "From the point where I stood, with Generals Lee and Longstreet," says our Special Artist, writing from the Confederate camp, "I could see the grape, shell, and canister from the guns of the Washington artillery now avenged in the masses of Federal troops rushing to the assault, while the infantry, posted behind a breastwork under the battery, delivered their fire with terrible effect on the enemy. In the distance, Franklin's corps is seen deploying into line of battle on the Federal left. Every house and building there was thrown forwards shelling the Confederate positions on the wooded range of hills. A portion of Fredericksburg is seen in the rear of the attacking force, and beyond the range of hills is seen on the opposite side of the river from which the Northerners have heavy guns playing on Marye's Hill over the heads of their troops. The direction in which shell are bursting over the Confederate soldiers in the breastwork. It was here General Cobb was killed, and it is here that the gallant Georgian regiment, at the back of the hill a South Carolinian had a portion of his head carried away within four yards of myself by a shell from the Federal artillery. After the fall of Cobb, there were 260 dead lying on a small plot of ground, scarcely four acres in extent, at the back of the hill shown in the Sketch. Major Shumpert, 1403 were buried between the hill and the town. Eight hundred were buried on that part of the field occupied by Franklin. These were all Federals. The attack was made on Sunday, the 14th, and left amount to 2293. The Federals, besides this, buried many within their lines on the night of the battle."

The Southern correspondent of the Times, in his letter from Richmond, written shortly after the battle of Fredericksburg, has many remarks on the important post of Marye's Hill, and of the dreadful slaughter of the assaulting troops, to whose bravery he bears no niggard testimony. He says:—"The position on the extreme right was occupied by the Washington artillery, commanded by Colonel Walton, of New Orleans, and posted on the heights in the immediate neighbourhood of Fredericksburg, not more than 400 yards from the town. These heights, which are precisely of that altitude which is most favourable to the play of artillery, are surmounted by a brick house, now riddled by round shot, belonging to Mr. Marye, and are consequently known as Marye's Heights. The ascent is steep, but not inaccessible, and left amount to 2293. The Federals, besides this, buried many within their lines on the night of the battle."

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

COLONEL SIR GEORGE LLOYD HODGES, K.C.B.

This very distinguished military officer and diplomatist was the eldest son of George Thomas Hodges, Esq., of the Abbey, in the county of Limerick, by his wife, Anne, daughter of Edward Lloyd, Esq., of Lloyd's Island in the county of Cork, and Castle Mahon, in the county of Limerick. He was born at The Abbey, in the county of Limerick, in 1779, and entered the British Army as Ensign in 1805. He served in the Peninsula from 1806 to 1814, including the battles of Vittoria and the Pyrenees. He was also in the campaigns of 1815, and was present at the battle of Quatre Bras and Waterloo. In these last-mentioned campaigns he was three times wounded. In 1832 he was appointed Military Secretary to the British and Foreign Legion of Don Pedro, under the command of his Imperial Majesty Dom Pedro. In the operations which ensued a high martial reputation, particularly at the capture of Oporto, where he was the first to force. In January, 1837, he was consequently made a C.B. In December, Consul-General. In 1839 he was appointed Diplomatic Agent and Consul-General in Egypt, which office he held and distinguished part in the struggle between Mehemet Ali and the European Powers, for which he received the marked approval of his Government. In 1840 he assisted in the hostile operations by sea and land in the coast of Syria, and was made a Knight Grand Cross of the Turkish Order of the Medjidie. In 1841 he was appointed Consul-General in the circle of Lower Saxony and Hanover, residing at Hanover. During the Russian war, in August was promoted to the rank of Charge-d'Affaires. In 1843 he was made Minister Resident and Consul-General to the German Diet at Frankfort. In 1851 the Duchies of Mecklenburg-Schwerin and Strelitz, and in 1849 Commissioner, in conjunction with the Austrian Commissioner, to settle the affairs of the Government of Schleswig-Holstein. In 1841 he received Her Majesty's license to accept and wear the decoration of the Knight Commander of the Order of Military Order of St. Benedict d'Avis, conferred on him by the Queen of Portugal. For his services in Spain Her Majesty was graciously pleased to confer upon him the Order of the Grand Ninham, with the rank of General of Division and a sword of honour; which Order he has received by her Majesty's permission to accept. In 1851, on the termination of his mission to Schleswig-Holstein, he was appointed C.B., and on his retirement from the diplomatic service in 1860, a K.C.B. The Senate of Hamburg also conferred upon him their splendid gold medal, bearing on the obverse the bust of Hamburg's patriot Sir George Rodney married Miss Purcell, eldest daughter of James Purcell, Esq., of New Grove, in the county of Limerick, in July a decease.

LADY KIRKCUDBRIGHT.

The Right Hon. Sarah Lady Kirkcudbright, who died on the 31st inst., was the daughter of Sidney Meadows Esq., and married in 1798 Alexander, 6th Lord Macleian, ninth and last Lord Kirkcudbright, in the peerage of Scotland, who died at Bourdeaux, on the 17th of April, 1833, leaving her only surviving child, Hon. Camden Elizabeth, now the wife of James Staunton Lambert, Esq., of Creg Clare, in the county of Galway, formerly M.P. for that county.

The Right Hon. Eliza, Dowager Lady Monson, who died on the 22nd inst. at the family residence, Burton Hall, Lincolnshire, was the only child of her husband a few weeks, was the youngest daughter of the late Edward Jackson, Esq., of Hackney, by his second marriage with Miss Eliza Ann, daughter William John Monson, sixth Lord Monson, of Burton, in the county of Lincoln, and a Baronet, who died on the 17th of March, 1774. She was left by her, William John, present Lord Monson, three other sons, and an only daughter, Florence Grace.

MAJOR HENRY LOFTUS.

This gallant and lamented officer was died at Murree, India, on the 2nd of November last, was the second son of the late Lieut.-General Loftus, of Lakeside, in Surrey, and Mary, his wife, four hour sister of the present of Viscounts Lotus, of Ely, by his wife, Margaret Harriet, eldest daughter of Archdeacon Lonsdale, of Ely. He was born in 1824, and married Longrishe, Bart. Major Henry Loftus, who was born in 1824, having entered the British army in 1842, served in the 17th Foot in the Sutlej Light Infantry, throughout the Crimean campaign. He was present at the siege of Sebastopol, on the 18th of April, the battle of Inkerman, and other affairs. He acted also throughout the central Indian campaign in the late mutiny; was present at Jhansi, and all the actions in front of Calpee, on Calpee, the capture of Calpee, and the battle of Morar. He were the Colonel, Gallop, and Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Robert Napier, and the Colonel of the Meldpide, Major Henry Loftus's elder brother is Lieut.-Colonel Loftus, commanding the 5th Regiment of Bengal Native Infantry, and also through campaign and Indian mutiny, and was dangerously wounded at Lucknow. He married, in 1858, Augustus Cranley Conlow, Esq., nephew of the Earl of Onslow, and Mrs. Conlow, of Clandon Park, Guildford, S. Shildon, son of the late Ralph Sheldon, Esq., M.P., of Bhiles, Warwickshire.

THE REV. ROBERT HANKINSON, M.A.

This venerable and highly-esteemed gentleman, for many years past had been the senior clergyman of the diocese of Norwich, was born at Lynn, in the parish of St. Nicholas, on the 3rd November, 1776, and was the son of Grammar School, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1794 he married Sarah, daughter of Mr. Gelder, of Lynn, by whom he had issue, one of Walpole St. Andrew's, which living he held for the last fifty-five years. He was also in commission of the peace for the county of Norfolk. His death occurred at St. Andrew's vicarage, the 8th inst. At the time of his death he had been in the active service clergyman for sixty-five years, and as Justice of Peace and Deputy Lieutenant of Norfolk. His name was given as visitor of horses and cattle at the Norfolk Agricultural Show, and he was a warm supporter of benevolent and educational as well as of religious institutions. He was also a Governor of Gresham's School, Holt, and a liberal subscriber to all the charities of the neighbourhood. By his wife, who died many years since, he had (with daughters) three sons, the eldest of whom, Robert Hankinson, M.A., is Archdeacon of Norwich and Vicar of Halesworth, Suffolk; the late Rev. Edmund Hankinson, M.A., Rector of Gayton Thorpe, Norfolk, and the late author of poems which for several successive years gained the Seatonian prize, and the Rev. Edward Francis Edwards Hankinson, formerly Incumbent of St. John's, Lynn, and now of Hempnall, Norfolk. Also two daughters, Mrs. Lynn, attached. One of the late Mr. Hankinson's daughters is the widow of the late Rev. Charles Parry, the celebrated Arctic navigator, and Governor of Greenwich Hospital.

WILLIAM COTTON, ESQ., F.S.A.

William Cotton, Esq., F.S.A., the well-known publisher and collector of biographic souvenirs and relics relating to Sir Joshua Reynolds, and a patron of the portrait painter, died on the 20th inst., at his residence, Ashurst Lodge, Hoe-terrace, Plymouth, in the sixty-ninth year of his age, was the son of Mr. Cotton, of Plymouth, by his wife, Miss Hall, of Plymouth, and was inherited from his father, a famous collector in his day, a magnificent gathering of portraits of Sir Joshua Reynolds, and other curiosities of the great painter, together with extreme care and taste and regardless of cost. The possession of these treasures increased in Mr. William Cotton a love for art, and especially of art of the Reynoldsian period; and, although his father had died in 1819, when the son was but fifteen years of age, the latter became a patient and indefatigable collector that he soon restored the collection to its former completeness. In 1833 Mr. William Cotton married the only child of the family of Shortland, of Plymouth, some years ago, left the Priory, at Plymouth, and removed to Cotte, Somersetshire, and Mr. William Cotton, there manicurely made arrangements with the proprietors of the Plymouth Journal to issue a monthly publication, to be illustrated by the most accomplished hands with the best engravings from the collection, and conducted by the national schools of the place. Mr. Cotton was the author of several works, including "Sir Joshua and his Friends," "Sir Joshua Reynolds," "Memorials of Crowhicks, &c., in Cornwall;" "The Antiquities of Tetsure, in Devonshire;" "Notes of the Life of Sir Joshua Reynolds," with many other valuable and interesting particulars about Plympton and the neighbourhood. "A Catalogue of the Portraits of Sir Joshua Reynolds," and a number of other works on pictures, and engravers, if engraved. "A Catalogue of the Library at Lambeglend, Surrey," &c.

MR. RICHARD GREEN.

The death of Mr. Richard Green can be regarded as little less than a public calamity by many who are best qualified to understand the position he established with respect to the commercial interests of London. A short time ago a still larger number of men were associated with him in the works of which he was the head, of which he was the chief supporter and director, and the loss of a man, charitable without ostentation, and who, throughout his life, had his great commercial success at the same time simple and beauty plainly

THE PHILHARMONIC concerts, this year eighi in number, are to begin on March 9.

A French gentleman, M. Barthe, 6, Rue de la Fonderie, Toulouse, is announcing a new system of teaching the English language by means of Spanish military plans. These are—1st. Details of all the strong places in Spain, particularly in the fortifications of the Canons and Pyrenees. 2nd. The topography of the shores of the Peninsula, to a depth inland of about twenty leagues, showing the soundings of the ports, where vessels could penetrate. 3rd. The coasts of Africa from Ceuta to Oran, with the fortification of the latter place. 4th. Plans of topographical engineering, and drawn upon the spot by French and Spanish officers and engineers.

SAXON ENGLISH.—The table of 1611 has 97 per cent of Anglo-Saxon, 2 per cent Norse, and 1 per cent Latin; the first Testament writer, 95, the inference is obvious. And if the genius of our tongue is Teutonic in writing, it is not more so in speaking. "Let us now examine more closely the more famous element, still among the peasantry Latin words "of learned origin, transferring words" are popular—"as among other tongues plus unimportant parts, and serve as scaffolding, or, to use a more expressive modern, Saxon can furnish no suitable terms. An excessive use of Latin derivatives is, therefore, impracticable. Even those parties who contend for the Saxon element employ a full proportion of Latin or French terms in the very sentences in which they plead most earnestly for the Germanic words! It is quite true that justice has not hitherto been done in our schools and colleges to our old English tongue, but the seeds of a better state of things are surely promoted by increasing the merits of a case.—D'Arcy's Study of the English Language.

Abraham," and other Biblical subjects, were the result of his studies there. To this period also belong his "Lion Hunt" and "Arab Mother Rescuing a Child from a Lion." The cause of the sudden coldness between Vernet and Louis Philippe is said to have been the painter's refusal to falsify history by representing the Grand Monarque, Louis XIV. (who, as Macaulay shows, is open to a strong suspicion of personal cowardice), mounting to the assault of Valenciennes. Soon after this Vernet received a visit to St. Petersburg, where he was received with marked attention by the Emperor Nicholas. He returned to France after the death of the Duke of Orleans, and his old friendly relations with the Tuileries were re-established. In 1846 he painted for Versailles (in eight months) the large picture, "The Taking of the Smalah of Abd-el-Kader," one of the largest pictures in the world; and in the following year, "The Battle of Isly." He next painted another very large picture, "The Battle of Constantine," for the present Emperor. Two French Universal Exhibition of 1855 he contributed, among others, "The Chelem of Mahomet II.," and "Mazeppa," and "Man in the Camp," which were the last of his splendid scenes of the Crimean campaign have succeeded, one of which, "The Inkermann Battle of the Alma," he sent to the last Paris Exhibition. Of his Italian works the occasion of its exhibition to offer a criticism upon the painter's merits. Vernet took his subjects from the Roman campagna, and from various scenes and incidents of similar pretensions, only less successful. Vernet has painted an immense number of pictures. Nobody himself was more conscious of this than the painter himself with the mass of his countrymen is greatly due to his accurate choice of his subjects, and to the scale on which he usually executes them. His pictures generally form, however, a not very high estimate of his art. But his works possess, these all agree, two qualities eminently Parisian—movement and cleverness—while his military knowledge and minute excitation rendue more or less accurate, veritable batailles. His career was a long course of popularity and honour. He was a Commander of the Legion of Honour, a member of the Institute and of the Academy of Fine Arts, and a host of knighthood were conferred upon him by every Continental Prince. He was by his period an unique; lived at Versailles and at his villa in the Bois de l'Institut in a very handsome style; was extremely beloved by his friends; always hospitable and generous. Vernet left one son, Horace, and one daughter, Mme. Delaroche, married to a great age, was the daughter of the first Earl of Beverley. The will was executed in 1854, and her Ladyship disposes of her freehold residence as before mentioned, to her daughter, Lady Louisa Russell, and to her son-in-law, Lord Ampthill, for their respective lives, and then devises the estate to Southwood Lovell, for the term of his natural life, with remainder to his children. To her son, Lieutenant-General the Hon. Thomas Ashburnham, C.B., a legacy of £1000 is bequeathed, and to her daughter, Lady Louisa Russell, a legacy of £1000, in addition to her marriage portion. The remainder of her property she bequeaths to her children equally between them.

The will of General Sir Philip Bainbrigge, K.C.B., of St. Margaret's, Southampton, was proved on the 5th ult., under £7000 personalty. The testator was born in 1784, and was formerly John Bainbrigge, and is the son-in-law, Frankish Lushington, Esq., late of Calcutta, and Lushington, Esq., late of Calcutta, and the testator's son, Frankish Lushington, Esq., late of Calcutta, and the testator's son, Frankish Lushington, Esq., late of Calcutta, and the testator's son, Frankish

THE SUEZ CANAL.

SCENE ON THE SWEET-WATER CANAL, NEAR TEL-EL-KIBEER.

Our next stoppage was at Ramses, a station of the company and the site of an ancient town. In an excavation we saw a granite mass representing Rameses I. sitting between the gods. The back part of the stone is covered with hieroglyphics in a very bad state of preservation. The whole thing has been very badly used; but the company have taken measures to preserve this interesting relic of the past. The company have established extensive works for brickmaking here, the quality of the material being very superior: it supplies all the stations. A gentleman resident explained these matters, and did the hospitable charmingly. There was much to see here, but time pressed, and we therefore re-embarked and proceeded on our way to Timsah, which we reached at sunset.

As the landing-stage is about half an hour's ride from the town, we were supplied with dromedaries, and soon reached our destination, where we were received most kindly by M. Leconte, Chef du Campement at Tunash, who placed his rooms at our disposal, and had an excellent dinner prepared. The following morning this gentleman took us everywhere where there was anything to see, and we were much delighted. The town of Tunash is to be the permanent station, and has even now attained the proportions of a very respectable town in Europe. Some thousands of tellahs were at work on the continuation of the northern or Mediterranean branch of the sweet-water-canal.

The Engraving representing a general View of the Town and Works may convey a fair idea of the bustle that existed at Tunash. The streets are admirably laid out, and the houses thetsme. The streets are admirably laid out, and the houses are all substantially built of stone, and double roofed. To the extreme left of the picture the masts of the boats in the distance indicate the position of the landing-place on the canal de Tranet. The next prominent object is M. de Lesseps' chateau, in the Swiss cottage style. The large houses are the workshops and engineers and M. Le Chef de Campement; further on to the right we pass cafés, billard-rooms, &c., and arrive at the company's stores and magazines, with a multitude of accessories in the way of donkeys and camels, and departing, bawling men, and excited storekeepers. Further on is the engine-house for supplying the town of El-Girsh. Further on is the engine-house for supplying the town of El-Girsh. Mexican grass has been planted on both edges and promises to grow well. This is to preserve the sides, which would be in injury by the trackers constantly walking over them.

Sir Henry Bulwer being expected at Tunash about sunset to-day, the 18th, we waited some time; but, seeing no signs of the boats, we pushed on to El-Girsh, distant about eight miles, and there we were delighted to find a substantial cooking, well-lighted hotel. The proprietor showed us our rooms and set about preparing some couture comforts, which are all-important in the desert, but lamps and making one's appetite quite wolfish.

The hotel boasts a public room and a billiard-table, and seems well patronised, the visitors being moderate. The European staff at El-Girsh appears very numerous, but will no doubt be draughted to the other works soon. Through the window we could see the Arab Pasona. I was introduced to a number of gentlemen connected with the works, and was over-whelmed with kind attentions.

The community at El-Girsh have organised themselves into a club, and possess, amongst other advantages, a tolerably-arranged museum, which contains specimens of reptiles, fossils, and many curiosities which have been brought to light during the excavations. A well-conducted reading-room is attached, at which many things speaks well for the spirit and intelligence of its members.

Mr. Villar, the chief engineer at Ismailia, received us most courteously, and on our request supplied us at once with dromedaries to cross the Sand Desert.

At eleven a large party arrived at El-Girsh, composed of Sir Henry Bulwer and suite and other distinguished gentlemen, accompanied by M. Lesseps, to whom we were introduced. This gentleman did me the honour to present me to his Excellency the Ambassador. A dinner had been provided at El-Girsh for the whole party, to which we were invited. After partaking of this meal the company visited the most interesting objects, and eventually took their departure for Tunash, by water, leaving instructions with the dromedaries having been prepared for the visitors.

Our time not permitting us to continue the voyage to Port Said, we determined to cross the desert to Suez; and took our departure, leaving with infinite regret many kind friends who had spared no pains to make the visit as pleasant as possible.

MUSIC.

THE MONDAY POPULAR CONCERT of this week was excellent and successful as usual. The instrumental pieces were all well known to the musical portion of the public, but they were of the highest order, and were played with consummate excellence. They were Spohr's Nonetto in F, for violin, tenor, violoncello, double bass, flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, and horn; played by Messrs. Sainton, Webb, Pratti, C. Severn, Pendlebury, Barret, Hutchins, and C. Harper; a Romanza of Viotti, played on the violoncello by Pratti; Mozart's pianoforte quartet in A, by Arabella Goddard, Ries, Webb, and Pratti, the quartet in E flat, of the set dedicated to Salieri; and Haydn's quartet in B flat, No. 60. The vocal pieces were Mozart's cavatina "Non Sdegno," from the "Ratto," sung last evening by Mdme. Sainton-Dolby; "The Violet," and the latter "The Orphan's Song," by the Russian composer Glinka. They also were sung admirably, as was Mozart's "The Arabian Nights." We are glad to learn that Mdme. Arabella Goddard is to appear at the concert on Monday next.

Balfe's new opera, in preparation at Covent Garden, will be produced, we understand, the week after next. We may venture to say that the public will find it a chef-d'œuvre.

The Parisian musical theatres are active. At the Grand Opéra "Le Muette de Portici" (Massaniello) has been revived with all the care and splendour of a new production, and has had a most gratifying reception. Gueymard has the character of the Neapolitan fisherman, and the dumb girl Fenella is personated by the young and charming dancer, Mdlle. Vernon, who has been substituted for Mdlle. Livry, still suffering from her terrible accident. New operas by Gounod and Reyer, and one of an forthcoming set of "Les Soirées de la Opéra Comique a new opera by the veteran Auber (turned eighty!) is in rehearsal. It is called "La Fiancée de la Mort," and the libretto is by the deceased Scribe, Auber's celebrated collaborateur for so many years. At the Théâtre Lyrique a strange sort of novelty is said to be in preparation. "Love's Labour Lost" is to be turned into an opera, with the Music of Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte." What is become of Balfe's "Bohemian Girl," announced some months back as being in preparation at this theatre?

Gounod's opera, "Faust," has just been produced at Berlin, under the title of "Margaretha," with complete success. This opera, it will be remembered, was composed for, and first performed at, the Grand Opera of Paris; and it is now making the round of the chief theatres of Germany with an eclat which is far more remarkable from the fact that Spohr's "Faust," the chef-d'œuvre of that great composer, is not to be seen regular upon the boards of any theatre. It may be expected, in the present dearth of musical novelty, that a work of so much Continental fame will be given at our Royal Italian Opera.

A grand opera, in three acts, entitled "Der Wald bei Hermannstadt," composed by Wilhelm Vetterspan, has been brought out with success at Dresden. It is splendidly got up, admirably performed, and warmly applauded.

It is reported that Mr. Mapleson, the lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre, has made an offer to the Italian Government for a lease of the San Carlo Theatre, of Naples.

Giuglini is going to Vienna, to fulfil an engagement there.

THE THEATRES.

THEATRE ROYAL, WESTMINSTER.—Considerable public interest attaches to the conduct of this theatre, under Mr. Boucicault's management, as an example of the style of improvement proposed by that gentleman in the business of theatres generally. Hitherto he had not, however, commenced management in earnest—the remodelling of the building having regarded as sufficient in the way of promise. On Monday last that promise was partly fulfilled by the production of a new piece from his own pen, and founded on Sir W. Scott's "Heart of Midlothian." It has been long understood that Mr. Boucicault had a drama on that subject, which he had turned on the American boards, and which was well calculated to create a sensation on the English stage. Nothing less, indeed, than another "Colleen Bawn" was anticipated; and, if we may judge from the reception of the first night, "The Trial of Effie Deans" will become the rival in public estimation of that extraordinary drama. The house was filled in every part with a fashionable and intelligent audience, evidently prepared to assume a critical attitude, and deliberately carrying at a favourable judgment. The new piece presents the elegance of the dialogue and the clever arrangement of the situations more than quitte the popular work of which it is the result, and in every respect, and illustrated with scenery representative of views in and around Old Edinburgh by Mr. Roberts and Mr. Gordon Hemsley, is also well cast. We never saw Mr. Ryder to more advantage than in that of David Deans. The old man's strongly-marked character and solemnity of tone in the public epistles in which he had himself been reared and heard his offspring "often called upon the name of the Lord," and which he then received appeared almost too much for him to endure and live. A curse involuntarily rose to his lips, but he struggled with it, and it was but half pronounced. This situation concluded the first act in a powerful manner, and Mr. Ryder was deservedly summoned before the curtain. The second act terminates with the trial of Effie, in which Mr. Boucicault himself performs the part of the leading counsel for the prisoner. Here the business of the court is copied from the Edinburgh one, and Mr. Boucicault assumes the manner of the popular advocate who trusts to his eloquence and his finesse to perplex his jury and to get off a man somehow or other. The speech of this thing completely carried the audience away, and they sympathised with the progress of the case exactly as they would have done at a real trial. The third act compresses a large amount of action into the narrowest compass. Joane Deans, admirably acted by Mrs. Boucicault, travels in a fit by train from London, meets with perils by the way from Mey Murdochson (Miss Atkinson), and has her interview with Effie in the cell at Argyll Jail. Here Mr. Boucicault and wife the Queen (Mrs. Johnson), and returns, just as the Edinburgh mob have set fire to the Tolbooth, with the pardon in the hands of Effie's counsel, who rushes to the jail. When we did that Geordie Robinson was supported by Mr. Swinbourne, our readers will see at once that the author's dramatic power has been applied to the public purse most efficiently performed. Mr. Boucicault has discriminated the different characters with much skill, and has generally evinced much tact in the restraint of the theme that many an eye yielded to the pathetic touches of the dialogue, and paid its tribute to the dramatist's power in the scenes of deep interest. The piece was received with applauded throughout, and at the conclusion was pronounced, by an overflowing and exceedingly fashionable house, to be a triumphant success.

PAVILION.—On Saturday a new drama by Mr. John Douglas, jun., was produced, entitled "The Second Act Trump Card." This is professedly a "sensation drama." The second act terminates with an admirably-arranged scene among the Alps, in which an avalanche descends and breaks down a bridge, so that a prisoner who has escaped is obliged to yield to his pursuers. The person who is thus in peril is one Mr. Gaspard Lenoir, a French artist in the Swiss army (Mr. Charles Robinson), who is falsely accused of murder by Baron Cabeillo (under the feigned name of Pepito), his rival in love and in high favour with the latter discovers that the heroine is his sister, whom and whose husband he has been criminally prosecuting. As he has been wounded in the mêlée among the Alps, he is carried home in order to save Caspian, and then commits suicide. This drama is supported by some clever acting, assisted by Mr. F. Findlay, and was enthusiastically received by a full house.

THE COINAGE OF FRANCE.

THE coinage of France has never in a more satisfactory condition than it is at the present time, when it offers the result of many years' persevering care in its production and preservation. In former times there existed in France several mints authorised to coin, according to the requirements of the monetary service. At present three only exist—those, namely, of Paris, Strasbourg, and Bordeaux. At the first two—gold, silver, and bronze coins are struck; at Bordeaux only bronze. The machinery employed, and up, it is just now again actively employed in the manufacture of the new bronze coinage. The machinery is deficiently serviceable. The laureate description shown in our Engraving of a new piece of the value of ten centimes (or one-tenth of a franc), which is that adopted for the coinage of bronze. The new coinage has been issued, and the mints be definitively closed, as it is intended to confine the manufacture of the metal entirely exclusively to Paris.

On account of the premium on silver few pieces of two or five francs have been struck during the past year, as they would have been speedily melted down for the sake of profit. Hence the only smaller silver money the coinage has continued its usual course, without disadvantage to the interest of the country.

But the recent great reform in the French currency has affected principally the bronze money, which has latterly been imitated in England, to the great annoyance and inconvenience of traders and parties. The metal employed in France for the reconiage is an alloy of copper, tin, and zinc; it soon changes colour, but remains in wear well, being protected, not only by the public generally, but by a slightly elevated rim, which also guarantees the preservation of the design.

It was shortly after the termination of the late war in Italy that the coinage underwent as a short time the transient whim of the Emperor Napoleon III. with a wreath of laurel; and at present all the new coinage exhibits the same. The head of the smaller silver money the coinage has continued its usual course, without disadvantage to the interest of the country.

There are fourteen pieces of money actually in circulation in France—viz., five in gold, of 100, 40, 20, 10, and 5 francs; five in silver, of 5, 2, 1, 50 centimes, and 20 centimes; and two in bronze, of 10, 5, 2, and 1 centime. It is highly creditable to the French people that they have taken a public interest in the general appearance of their coins. It is in very rare to meet with a disfigured piece; indeed, among the old silver still current, the 5-franc pieces bearing Louis Philippe's effigy are handsomest as well as best preserved, perhaps on that account.

During the year 1862 the value of the gold coin struck in France was 213 millions of francs, whereas in 1861 it amounted to only 98 millions. The production of bronze coins with the laureate head followed the ordinary course, three million francs' worth having been prepared for circulation. In addition to the lion's share in this considerable amount of production, the Paris Mint struck large quantities of silver or bronze coins for the Governments of Russia, Switzerland, Chili, and Uruguay.

COLUMN FOR THE CURIOUS.

SPECULATION AT YORK-BUILDINGS AND HUNGERFORD.

In our Journal of Dec. 27 we recorded the demolition of what may be termed Nos. 1 and 2 Hungerford Market; for, although its erection cost some £200,000, it existed scarcely thirty years. It was "hailed at first," like the speculation, Sir Edward Hungerford's connexion with which it commemorates, as a public market, in 1680; but the site had been for a century and three-quarters a locality of ill-omened speculation. The Hungerford mansion was placed between York House and Suffolk—now Northumberland—House, and the fortunes of the one and the adjoining York Buildings were of diametrical interest. Of the York House estate the only relic is the picturesque water-gate, long ascribed to Inigo Jones, but by an account-book in the British Museum declared to be the work of Nicholas Stone. We need scarcely remind the reader that at York House lived Sir Nicholas Bacon, and here was born his son Francis Bacon, in 1560-1. Here he kept his sixtieth birthday, and here the Great Seal was taken from him. When unpatronised to part with the mansion, Bacon replied, "For this unprofitable house; for I have spent in that house where my father died, and where I first breathed; and there will I yield my last breath, if so please God and the King." He did not, however, return to York House after his release from the Tower, being forbidden to approach within the verge of the Court. Charles I., Duke of Buckingham, got possession of York House upon terms not scrupulously fulfilled; for, on July, 1622, Chamberlain writes to Carleton, "Yt is not St. Albans but Lord Hall in Chancery against Buckingham on account of the non-performance of his covenant for taking York House" (Mrs. Green's "Calendar of State Papers"). How this was settled, has not yet been explained. However, Buckingham having got possession, the King (James I.), after much trouble, persuaded the Archbishop of Canterbury to part with the freehold of the house (which had been the residence of the see) in exchange for other lands; and on 1st June, 1623, we find Buckingham. He had the old mansion taken down, and commenced building a magnificent new one, in which Portland stone was largely used; James also granted him for 2000 tons of timber, to be used in Buckingham's building. (Sir Bruce's State Paper "Calendar of Claims.") In the Bodleian Library is the history of York House not corresponding with the statement that Buckingham only built the water-gate, of stone now in a garden inhabited with lions, during the Thames, the house being merely a temporary structure: Buckingham's "incole soul." Pepys tells us, appeared "in the doorway and the whole house," and Evelyn mentions the visit to the house to General Fairfax, on the marriage of whose daughter and heiress to George, second son of Villiers, Buckingham, the property reconveyed to the Villiers family. The Duke resided here subsequent to the Restoration, but, in 1672, sold the estate for £30,000; the house was taken down, the site cleared, and the water-gate and site were erected York Buildings, which were afterwards severally named as we now see them.

A few persons of note came early to reside here. John Evelyn took a house in Villiers-street for the winter, in 1683; and Pepys, the diarist, had a house somewhere about the last on the west side of Buckingham-street, looking upon the Thames; and at the mansion of Sergeant Maynard, in Chancery Lane, Peter, the Wild Boy of Hanover, lodged for a time. Harley, Earl of Oxford, was living here in 1708, the year in which he was created a peer, and in consequence of his change of name and Villiers-street Sir Richard Steele lived after his wife's death, from 1721 to 1724: Mr. P. Cunningham found, in the rate-books of St. Martin's, the word "gone" opposite Steele's name in 1724; he died in Wales in 1729. Sir Richard had one of the many schemes in vogue for raising a fortune. Here he projected a new theatre for the stage, which required large premises; and, possibly, he may have fitted up some portion of Buckingham's reception-house which may have been granted to him. Speaking to some few friends about a sumptuous entertainment, with dramatic recitations, Addison assisted, and wrote an invitation for the occasion, in which we can relish the quiet humour of these lines:—

> The sage, whose guess you are to-night, is known
> To have writ more than he has ever shown.

It was in fitting up the theatre, which was opened with this entertainment, that Steele was outwitted by his carpenter. "The theatre was nearly completed, when Steele, anxious to know what it was well adapted for hearing, placed himself at the back of the gallery and begged the carpenter to speak up from the stage. The man did not know what to say, when Steele called out to him to say whatever was uppermost; and, after a moment, the carpenter began, in a voice perfectly audible, 'Sir Richard Steele, Sir, he says,' that unless he put me and my men has been a-working in this theatre, and we've never seen his face since we began to work on it, that he is much obliged if you'll pay it directly, for until you do we won't drive in another nail." Sir Richard said that his friend's elocution was perfect, but that his carpenter's was quite such.

In Duke-street, "over against the Blew Posts," lodged Humphrey Wanley, the learned librarian to Harley, Earl of Oxford, and poet's son, and a celebrated physician in his time, lived in the same street.

One of Jones's pictures at Hampton Court Palace, painted in the reign of George I., is called "The Lions," comprising Westminster-bridge, the Hall and Abbey, Whitehall, Hungerford-stairs, Adelphi, and the Watergate, with the Duke's palace and a model of a venerable steam-engine, or "fire-engine," for supplying the west end of London with water. The waterworks were undertaken by a company first incorporated by Act of Parliament, 1691. The works are described in the "Foreigner's Guide to London," 1720, and the company, extending its operations, had become a powerful monopoly, and securing lives, was one of the bubbles of that year of wild speculation. The company was in full work in 1731, when a fire-engine was erected afterwards shown for several years as a curiosity. "Its working by sea-coal," says the London Daily Post, 1741, "was attended with so much smoke that it not only hurt the neighbours' houses, but spoil the furniture." The failure is burlesqued in a humorous ballad printed by Mr. Thomas Wright in "England under the House of Hanover." The confused affairs of the company, and the consequent disputes and lawsuits with its creditors and debtors, gave rise to a host of pamphlets, and the Duke of Buckingham's novel "Zeal" of the property was sold in 1783. However, the spirit of the York Buildings speculations lingered in the minds of the public for many years after, in 1818, were "the Sea-water Baths," which were supplied by a vessel with water from below Southend. It may be curious to add that however the smoke of the fire-engine of 1720 may have polluted the air and spoilt the furniture, in the upper chambers of the house looking Hungerford-market, the property years after the erection of his finest flesh pictures amidst the smoke of the Thames steamers at Hungerford-pier.

CANDLEMAS.—Notwithstanding the Popish character of Candlemas, and its hallowing and conjuring of candles, in 1626 we find a Bishop of Lincoln ordering indoles to be made up and celebrated with 220 candles and 16 torches; and, in 1790, the collegiate church of Ripon, Yorkshire, had on the Sunday before Candlemas-day, "one continued blaze of light all the afternoon by an immense number of candles."

BRIDEWELL.—The old hall, the last remains of Bridewell Hospital, in Blackfriars, as rebuilt after the Great Fire of 1666, has just been taken down. It was a handsome wainscoted apartment, and beneath it was a large kitchen, used once a year for dressing the dinner for the Governors, in June, at the expense of the twelve stewards. The hall is engraved in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for July 6, 1850, with its Holbeins and other pictures upon the walls, and the Governors' dinner.

ALBERT GATE, HYDE PARK.—Lady Morgan, in her "Memoirs," lately published, narrates her exertions to obtain for the public that handsome entrance to the park. The pair of stags placed upon the piers formerly occupied a similar position at the entrance to the Ranger's Lodge in the Green Park, from Piccadilly. The stags were modelled from a pair of prints by Bartolozzi, which some forty years since, we were informed by Mr. Benjamin Talatt, of Bond-street, he sold to the sculptor of the stags, we think, Turnerelli.

COVENT GARDEN.—Sydney Smith, in his odd way, calls this noted locality "the amorous and herbivorous parish of Covent-garden."

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

ALTHOUGH the scheme for holding a grand closing ceremony, under the auspices of the Heir to the Crown, in the exhibition building proved abortive, and the ill-fated palace has been given up to, it is feared, irrevocable damp, desolation, and dinginess, South Kensington is not to be bereft of one more pageant which shall have some reference to the triumphant conquerors of art and industry that have characterised the reign of Queen Victoria. The Memorial of the Exhibition of 1851, to be erected in the Gardens of the Royal Horticultural Society, approaches completion. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has been solicited to grace the inauguration with his presence, and, with that prompt and kind condescension which gives so brilliant an augury for the popularity in the future, has at once acceded to the request. The letter sent on the part of the Prince by General Knollys to Mr. George Godwin stated that as Royal Highness "cannot but feel that he is contributing towards carrying out the wishes of a beloved and lamented parent that the Memorial of the Exhibition of 1851 should be inaugurated with every circumstance of honour."

So, on the 5th of June, 1863, there will be high festivities at South Kensington; and although they will not all the pomp, and splendour, and decorative sculpture can do to perpetuate the memory of a momentous event in the world's history will be effected. The Exhibition of '51 will, however, have a more enduring monument. It is already deep grown on the hearts of the people of England.

Before that time summer day comes round another occurrence—for weeks the engrossing topic for town talk—will have taken place. The Prince's wedding will make its appearance in good time happy and glorious. Although a mysterious silence is yet observed by the Lord Chamberlain's department as to the ceremonial is to be observed in the way of bedizzens, heralds, and trumpeters, the whole country is busy in devising programmes for a splendid display during those auspicious days of March. Triumphal arches, volunteer guards of honour, fireworks, flags, joyballs, and we trust, banquets to the poor and donatives of money to baby and old folks, about every where. The Corporation of London will not be behindhand, and Guy and Gog will put on their bravest apparel to welcome the pride and glory of the France and his Scandinavian bride into the metropolis.

Apropos of heraldry, precedence, titles of honour, courtesy, and so forth. We always endeavour to observe the most scrupulous discretion in our dealings with the head or members of the Royal family, and are eased in white satin shoes or in hobnailed boots. But there is a little malevolent echo just now floating about town, and whispered from boudoir to boudoir, from Belgravia to Bayswater, which we may without sinning against les bienséances, allude to. A very amiable, accomplished, and grande dame de par le monde has, it is said, been married (en quatrième noces) to an Under-Secretary of State. The names of both bride and bridegroom are known to the fashionable, the last aristocratically, speaking; only in this particular case the gentleman happens to be a commoner, and the lady the widow of an Earl. Now, there exists that title "Dame" between a peeress and a peeress, who signs himself "Blue Mantle," writes to a contemporary very learnedly, and almost courteously, to remonstrate that the lady has no right to cling to even the shadow of her coronet. "Blue Mantle" forgets that this title is purely a matter of courtesy, and that everybody is about has no right of peerage exists or is claimed; and, moreover, the fastidious critic, in assuming his nom de plume, has rendered himself amenable to the charge of a deficiency in knowledge of nomenclature: the real "Blue Mantle" being a Pursuivant-at-Arms attached to the Sovereign's College. 'Twas lucky that he was not M. did not sign himself "Rouge Croix," or he would have roused the ire of the redoubtable Mr. James Robinson Planché, Pursuivant of that ilk.

Heraldic hypercriticism notwithstanding, society, we believe, will see no harm in the beautiful and fashionable Duchess Mathilde Waldegrave continuing a Countess to the end of the chapter. But this John suggests another little Echoette, has lavished his pains philological. What does a member of the family of Fortescue" (sic), who seeks in the pages of our esteemed contemporary Notes and Queries for information respecting the history of his name by spelling Fortescue with a q? Etymology is dead against him. The English Fortescue is merely the Norman fort escu, or fort ecu, and the Italian Forte scudo—the man with the strong shield, or "strong-fi-the-shield!" and the q sought to be interpolated would multiply the meaning and deprive the pronunciation into "Fortescue," or worse, into "Fortesqueue"—strong tail!

A series of sad accidents, all due to the agency of fire, has horrified the town during the past week. At Nice the English community has been thrown into mourning by the dreadful death of a beautiful young lady, who was burnt to death on her return from a ball given in honour of the King of Bavaria. Her dress caught fire from the embers of an open brazier. Her mother, in endeavouring to succour her, was so frightfully burnt that she has since died. In Upper Harley-street, London, another poor young lady, only six-and-twenty years of age, the pride and solace of her family, has also fallen a victim to the flames. She was retiring to rest, when, stooping to arrange the fire, from which she had removed the guard, a live coal ignited her light muslin dress. She, too, is dead. Then comes the dismal tragedy at the Princess' Theatre. Two unhappy ballet girls had had their skirts set on fire while waiting to come on in the transformation scene of the new pantomime. The accident was caused either by the flaring gas battens at the wing, or by a pan of coloured fire held in perilous proximity to their cobweb-like drapery. The two hapless girls lie in the Middlesex Hospital—only so much charred flesh stuck over with cotton wool, as we remember seeing the wretched scalded victims on board the Great Eastern after the explosion of the "steam jacket." The poor young creatures are yet alive while we pen these lines, but are not sheet goes to print one or both may have for ever succumbed.

The outcry against crinoline has been renewed with redoubled vigour in consequence of these catastrophes, and all the many arguments pro and burning alive are laid at the door, or rather the tube, of hoop-petticoats. Against this inconvenient use of crinoline, and the consequent fright, and excess in amplitude of skirt has long since been discouraged by the two great leaders of fashion in the civilised world—the Queen of England and the Empress of the French—the first opposition of the "steam jacket." The poor young creatures are yet alive while we pen these lines, but are not sheet goes to print one or both may have for ever succumbed.

Against this inconvenient use of crinoline, and the consequent fright, and excess in amplitude of skirt has long since been discouraged by the two great leaders of fashion in the civilised world—the Queen of England and the Empress of the French—the first opposition of the "steam crinoline, so far from doing harm, may effect a great deal of good. It is undeniable that the ladies say it is comfortable to wear, and that doctors declare it to be healthy. We don't hear of ladies who wear narrow petticoats dying of their complaints being brought on by exposure; by fire in private life we ascribe to two causes—First: the practice of wearing flimsy muslin dresses in winter-time; next, the most pernicious system of heat in the modern construction of grates, which are now built so low, open, and yawning, as almost to invite adults—to say nothing of children—to tumble into them. Until the invention of modern elegance render the use of low, open grates necessary, let them, at least, be protected by wire cages (save by unlocking) wire guards, which may be made as ornamental as nursery can wish, and, in the name of common-sense, let the ladies diminish their crinoline and cease reserving their full crinoline display for their outdoor walking, and forth with abandon those sleezy, ragged muslins, which, at the slightest spark, fly into a blaze.

With regard to accidents by fire in theatres—which have been very rare since the death of poor Clara Webster, nearly twenty years since—it is certain that were the dresses of ballet-dancers made, at least, wear no crinoline—steeped in a solution of tungstate of soda or sulphate of ammonia they would become as incombustible as asbestos. To this it has been objected that such steeping would mar the snowy hue of the ballet-dancers' drapery, and that, even if the under-garments, which could hardly, as a rule, be subjected to the same process, would still be liable to incineration. To our mind, the great prevalence of fires in theatres has its origin in the system of provision and remodelling of the system of lighting adopted. Although the footlights are, as a rule, innocuous, we often hear of "a blaze," "set piece," and "sky borders" catching fire. Cannot some means be devised for concentrating the light now so incongruously scattered about the stage?

Clever, pushing, and useful Miss Emily Faithfull is about to tax once more the feminine energies of the Victoria Press in the production of a poetical album, to be dedicated to the Princess of Wales, and which in beauty of typography and excellence of literary matter is to surpass the far-famed "Victoria Regia." Among the contributors to Miss Faithfull's forthcoming volume we read the names of the Hon. Mrs. Norton, Mrs. Grote, Miss Mulock, Mrs. S. C. Hall, Miss Isa Craig, Miss Martineau, and Miss Christina Rossetti (the authoress of "The Goblin Market"); and, en fait de Messieurs, of Lord Carlisle, Professor Ringsley, Mr. Antony Trollope, Mr. Sidney Dobell, M. Louis Blanc, Mr. Owen Meredith, and Mr. George Macdonald.

General Tom Thumb is about, for the tenth time, if puffs are to be believed, to be married. Mr. Barnum has announced to the public of New York that the future bride of the famous dwarf-general is Miss Lavinia Warren, twenty-one inches high, and granddaughter of General Warren, who was killed at the battle of Bunker's Hill! As the diminutive couple are to be married, and installed in "the crowned heads of Europe," the beneficent Barnum offers the New Yorkers a final opportunity of attending the General's levee on the American Museum, and at the small charge of twenty-five cents a head.

We are able to state, this time without fear of contradiction, that Mr. Sala, whose health has broken down, and whose medical advisers have ordered change, rest, and quiet, will, by way of variation, if not decrease of labour (say oakum-picking and stone-breaking in lieu of the treadmill and the wash), be finally published, the editorship of Temple Bar, the management of which magazine will henceforward devolve on his old friend and coadjutor Mr. Edmund Yates.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

W. B. B. Jun.—Much too obvious a move for a solution.

J. R. JUVENIS, L. P.—They are under examination, but with so many others that our Chess Editor cannot undertake to say when they will appear.

C. P. W.—Your problem is ingenious, but the key-move you find is met by many other variations in that great repertory, the German "Handbuch."

AN ORDINARY.—You consider this move your King at check. See the rules of the game in "Chess Praxis," published by Bohn.

J. H. HOLDEN.—Your solution of No. 957 D to's letter in our Number of the 10th inst.

J. H. HOLDEN, Dublin.—Your solution of the problem in reply to your letter is correct.

J. THORNTON, Derby.—If you will be good enough to signify by initials which are the White and which are the Black men in your position, and at the same time forward the solution, the problem shall be re-examined.

C. The last move in the game between Mackenzie and M'Donnell. The loser in this contest wishes us to state that the gross result of his play with Mr. Mackenzie in five series of games is and that he hopes to be prepared in a fortnight or three weeks to meet Mr. Mackenzie in another three fights.

MEMBUS.—Copies of M. de Jaucharde's "Traité des Applications de Mathématiques au Jeu des Echecs" may be obtained of Messrs. Williams and Norgate, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden. From the Census of 1861 we learn that the population of Paris is 1,696,141, and that the "Société Récréative des Ouvriers du Jeu d'Echecs," of 7, Aide, Durand, Louis Blanc, and Jean Paul.

 The vote of prize and competing problems in the late tourney, which have been forwarded to Mr. Staunton, will be published in our next Number. The competitors are requested to send their names, addresses, and Christian and Collegiate names for the purpose of the selection, the decision of which must be final.

R. H., Hastings.—Your solution of the problem in the last strategem, No. 983, is answered in a notice to "W. D." which appears in last week's "Chess" column.

W. D.—Your solution of No. 983 is correct, and shall appear.

L. Oxford Union.—"Bicorn" as it is generally called, "The Great Divan," is situated in the Strand, facing Exeter Hall.

J. H. HOLDEN, Dublin.—You have lately been playing with M. de Riviere and other amateurs of note, in Paris.

J. H. HOLDEN.—Your move in No. 983 by Pallin, I. V.; R. S. Mallese; O. P. O.; Senior; F. R. R.; Oxford Union; "Bicorn"; and R. is a grossly unfair, "The Great Divan." is situated in the Strand, facing Exeter Hall.

WHITE.

White to play, and mate in four moves.

THE INSURRECTION IN POLAND.

BEARING in mind that the vague and contradictory telegrams which announced the outbreak and which indicate the progress of the insurrection in Poland, are given to the world on Russian authority, we deem it necessary to receive the only information they contain with more than usual reserve, to sift and compare every portion of it with the utmost vigilance, and resolutely to guard ourselves against forming hasty conclusions. From all the data to which, in common with the public, we have access, three or four inferences may, we think, be drawn without much fear that they will be overturned by subsequent tidings.

It seems certain that the present insurrection is not, or at any rate was not in its commencement, a national revolt—a preconcerted struggle of the Polish people to wrench themselves from the gripe of Russia and to achieve their independence. The Czar, in his address to the army, has admitted thus much. Considering the infamous disregard of national rights and susceptibilities with which Poland has been treated, the bad faith which has nullified all the guarantees which should have secured her political freedom, the elaborate and brutal cruelty which has been practised upon her in the hope of extinguishing her life and spirit as a nation, and the frequency with which her ruthless masters have thought fit to no reasonable man could affect surprise, far less indignation, if Poland, more intent upon casting off the intolerable burden of her own woes than careful to consult the convenience of Europe, should seize the first favourable opportunity offered her by passing events to snatch back, if possible, the indefeasible rights of which she has been wickedly despoiled. But European Liberals could not have witnessed an explosion at this moment of Polish patriotism, at least in the shape of massacre and insurrection, without profound regret shaded with disapprobation. The time would have been so ill chosen, the chance of success would have been so infinitesimally small, the damage inflicted upon that accumulation of moral force which the unhappy Poles have acquired during the last few years would have been so extensive and irretrievable, that no intelligent and hearty friend of Poland could have listened to news of another national uprising without heaving a sigh as for a bitter calamity. It is, therefore, a relief to be able to collect, and that, moreover, from exclusively Russian sources, incontestable evidence that the Polish nation, as a whole, have not committed themselves to a conflict from which nothing can be reasonably anticipated but disastrous failure. Warsaw has remained quiet from the first—a fact which may be explained, no doubt, by the presence of 40,000 Russian troops. But the refusal of the entire body of students to join the insurrection, the inaction of the upper and more influential classes, and the known determination of the best and most trusted friends of Poland, scattered throughout Europe, to discountenance any immediate appeal to physical force, corroborate the surmise of the Emperor that the present is not an organised attempt of the whole people of Poland to recover their long-suppressed national independence or to pluck from the battle-field their political freedom. Poland, it is clear, has not been guilty of wantonly inflicting this needless wrong upon herself.

> Keep the word of promise to the ear,
> And break it to the hope,

The origin of the affair which has awakened so anxious an interest throughout Europe is to be found in an act of the grossest administrative folly. Since the death of the Emperor Nicholas, conscription for the army has not been enforced in Russian Poland. It is a rough and exasperating process, even when the army which it is applied to recruit belongs to the country from which the conscripts are taken. Its operation upon the Poles was peculiarly harsh, for it condemned those of them upon whom the lot fell to wear out their lives in the alien and hated ranks of Russia. But the authorities who on this occasion had the management of the conscription, instructed probably by directions from St. Petersburg, converted this odious instrument of despotic power into a political engine of more than inquisitorial cruelty. The peasantry were wholly exempted. The measure was restricted in its application to the inhabitants of towns, amongst whom alone political life is to be found. The conscripts, instead of being drawn by lot, were designated by military and civil functionaries. Known patriotic aspirations attracted everywhere the vengeance of officials. The lists were compiled late with a view to the wants of the service than with a determination to sweep into military exile all the manhood of Poland suspected of too devoted a love of their country. In the middle of last month the plan began to be put in force. Between midnight and morning the homes of those condemned by the authorities to be thenceforth Russian soldiers were surrounded by companies of troops and squads of police. Young men and fathers were torn from their families, and hurried off to dépôts. Haul after haul was made with this terrible dragnet. Rage and consternation filled the breasts of the townspeople. It is uncertain whether, up to the time of the first razzia, there had been any premeditation of resistance. Very possibly the "coming event cast its shadow before;" and a hasty central organisation attempted to give some unity to efforts at self-defence. There appears to have been a general rush both of actual and expectant conscripts to the forests, and every band of soldiers met with was fiercely assailed, while such as were billeted among neighbouring villages were put to death. Prince Orloff, who foresaw what troubles the measure was likely to occasion, left Brussels for Warsaw that he might use his influence to prevent, if possible, its being carried into effect. He arrived in vain, for it has been predetermined to trample out the life of Polish nationality, and this insurrection has been the natural, we might be justified in saying the inevitable, result.

In spite of the assurances that are being daily flashed along the telegraphic wires to every capital in Europe, to the effect that the Russian Government are rapidly extinguishing the fire kindled in the Polish provinces by their own creatures, it is evident that the insurrection must have assumed formidable proportions. North, south, east, and west of Warsaw the same sad story is told. Telegraphic and postal communication interrupted, railway lines torn up, military posts harassed, forests alive with swarms of insurgents. It is no child's play. That it can succeed against the might and might of Russia no one can for a moment delude himself by expecting. The capital and the four great fortresses of Poland in the possession of her master. Her regiments count twenty millions against four millions oppressed. The insurgents are without leaders, without a commissariat, almost without arms, without any natural inexpugnable place of retreat, without hope of foreign assistance. But that they will be easily put down, or wellnigh at once, we do not for a moment believe success. Should they, as they have hitherto done, adopt a guerrilla method of warfare, and avoid congregating in large masses, they may manage to worry and wear out a considerable number of disciplined troops; and the longer they keep afloat the more likely it will be that the classes which now hold back will be sucked into the maelstrom of rebellion. We see this already to some extent. Some are goaded by their patriotism, others are driven by their apprehensions, out of the metropolis and the more populous towns, to join the ranks of, and make common cause with, their hapless brethren. The contagion, more especially should it spread, will become dangerous. The fire smothered in one district will burst out afresh in others. No doubt the insurrection will be subdued in course of time, and what Russia calls "order" will sooner or later, be re-established; but it is tolerably certain that for the iniquity which provoked this explosion the Government of the Czar will have to pay a heavy penalty.

For three or four years past, public opinion in Russia, if, in the legitimate sense of the words, such a thing there be, has been undergoing a favourable change in regard to Poland. Sympathy for the people whose cruel wrongs excited the liberal Northern Powers divided between them, and especially for those of them whom the Emperor Nicholas governed and crushed, had begun to percolate even into the Russian army. Alexander II. has probably cherished in his heart liberal intentions towards the victims of his father's tyranny and his own—but more, he has given some outward expression to them. The firmness and benevolence with which he has prosecuted to completion the abolition of serfdom throughout his dominions seemed to give the world a pledge that he would exercise the same high qualities in restoring Poland, if not to absolute, at least to administrative, independence. But are we altogether without hope that he may yet further ennoble his reign by erasing from the escutcheon of Russia the foulest blot by which it is defiled. This insurrection is an untoward incident in bar of any such wise and humane purpose, and it is to have a fatal effect in his hands. Yet we cannot but hope that, when quiet has been restored and the dust of disorder has been blown aside, and when he shall have ascertained the deplorable facts to which the present outburst must be ascribed, he may see in what is now passing not less but more reason to change the whole system of the Imperial Government so far as Poland is concerned. The nation which can only be dragooned into submission is a perpetual source of weakness to the governing race. The world's opinion condemns the experiment as an outrage, and the throne of the Czar cannot defy the world's opinion with impunity. Policy, no less than justice, demands a considerable restatement of the most unfortunate and, at the same time, the most gallant of European nations. Will the Emperor be deaf to the appeal? We hope not. That he will surrender the Polish crown is not to be expected,—is not, perhaps, all things being taken into account, to be desired. But Europe's reason and sense of justice will expect from him a fair reconciliation of his claims as a Sovereign with the wellbeing and political freedom of the subject people. We trust his own heart will prescribe what right and truth alike require; and that a course of generous and conciliatory policy on his part will give the civilised world a reliable guarantee that this shall be the last of Polish insurrections.

The Address of the Senate to the Emperor was, on the 30th ult., carried all but unanimously, there being only one dissentient—Prince Napoleon. A deputation from the Senate presented the Address at the Tuileries, and the Emperor on the 1st inst. The Court was present at the ceremony. Prince Napoleon was absent. The Emperor observed, as I understand,

> I receive with thanks the Address by which the Senate gives its approbation to my policy. The expressions of devotion which it contains touch me sincerely. The unanimity displayed in voting the Address has also given me deep satisfaction, because it proves that the Government can fail to bring about satisfaction, because it proves that the Government can fail to bring about satisfaction, because I receive my thanks, therefore, for having been the eloquent interpreter of the sentiments of an Assembly over which my presidency so willingly

The Marquis de Boissy has reappeared in the French Senate and inaugurated the Session with one of his characteristic onslaughts upon England, which provoked the usual amount of hearty laughter in the Assembly.

In the sitting of the Corps Législatif on the 30th ult. the draught of the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne was read. The reply is an entire approval of the Imperial policy at home and abroad—little more, indeed, than a paraphrase of the Speech. On the 4th inst. the general debate on the Address was closed.

M. Rouher, Minister, First President, and Court of Accounts, and Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour, died recently aged sixty-eight.

The Government has received intelligence from Mexico to the 27th of December. At that date Puebla was untaken, and General Forey was still at Orizaba, collecting provisions and ammunition preparatory to the advance. The forces under Marshal Bazaine, which came from New York, were preparing to give the French a warm reception. Three thousand of the Austrian contingent had landed at Vera Cruz, and the Mexican 1,600 are embarking at Algiers for the same destination, besides 300 Arabs for the baggage service. Agents have been busying themselves in Europe for the purchase of horses, and upwards of 1,000 of these useful animals are required.

On the 1st inst. the Emperor has drawn up for the education of his son a curriculum of studies which will fill a volume, and of which ten copies are to be printed.

PRUSSIA.

A children's festival was given at Berlin on the 27th ult. by the Crown Prince and Crown Princess, in honour of the birthday of Prince William, the Royal Highnesses' eldest son. Their Majesties dined with the Crown Prince and Crown Princess on the occasion, and entertained a number of children at supper in the evening.

The Premier formally announced to the Chamber of Deputies, on the 31st ult., that the King could not accept the Address which has just been adopted by the Chamber. The President consequently proposed that the Chamber should, at least, suspend its sitting, and the members immediately adopted the proposition without any debate.

The Upper House, or at least a large portion of it, have come forward as mediators in the dispute between the King and the Lower House. Fifty of the members belonging to the different political parties have met in conference, and declare that the apprehensions that each of the three legislative powers of the State have exceeded their rights, and that the Constitution does not prescribe which of the three is to yield in case of dissension. The members say they do not wish the Crown to infringe the law, and they hope that, by moderation and mutual concessions, the present disagreement may end. Absolutism may be averted, and promise their support to any project of agreement between the Crown and the Lower House.

DENMARK.

The Parliament was brought to a close on the 27th ult., after a Session of four months. It has been remarks he for the many important pieces of political news have been sent to the Legislature.

One of its final measures (we learn from the Dannark) was to pass several bills relating to the navy, the last of our three navies may be regarded as settled for a long time. The railway net spreads over North Jutland and Fyen, and consists of a trunk line from Aalborg to the mouth of Limfjord, another from Aarhuus and Frederics to Vamdrup on the Slesvig border, and a branch from Aarhus over Randers to Grenaa, on the Kattegat. The last line will connect Aarhus with Copenhagen by means of a steam-ferry for goods and passenger waggons. As soon as similar arrangements shall be established between Helsingoer in Sweden, and Elsinore, in Sealand, the whole Scandinavian North will have a satisfactory railway route by which to travel. Another line, in Sealand, will soon be put into operation between Roskilde and Korsoer. The Sealand Railway Company, whose line runs from Copenhagen to Korsör and the Great Belt, is now building another from the capital over Frederiksborg, the King's former residence, to Elsinore.

RUSSIA.

The various accounts from Russian Poland, although they represent the Government as gaining advantage over the insurgents, at the same time show that the insurrection is wide-spread, and that it will require the whole strength of the Government to suppress it.

GREECE.

The National Assembly has unanimously passed resolutions declaring the throne of Greece vacant by the King Otho, his issues and dynasty, and to have become vacant.

The Assembly has also declared Prince Alfred to have been elected King by 230,000 votes.

The rumours respecting the candidature for the throne by the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha have been most completely denied. A telegram from Athens on the 31st ult. informed us that Mr. Eliot, British Minister, formally announced to the Provisional Government the Duke's consent to become a candidate. The Coburg Gazette of the 4th inst., however, declares itself in a position to state that the negotiations with the Duke in regard to the Greek throne have ended in nothing, the Duke having definitively declined to become a candidate. The Duke has, it is added, given the world an account of the negotiations which preceded his refusal. The Greeks resident in London had unanimously adopted an address approving of the Duke's candidature.

M. Babbi, formerly Minister under the Coletti Administration, has been elected President of the National Assembly by a large majority; and M. Morsitesi, President of the Court of Cassation, has been chosen vice-president.

AMERICA.

By the arrival of the steamer City of Baltimore we have New York Journals to the 24th ult.

WAR NEWS.

General Burnside, on the 20th ult., issued the following address to his army, preparatory to another assault on the heights beyond Fredericksburg:—

> The commanding General announces to the Army of the Potomac that they are about to meet the enemy once more.
> The late brilliant actions in North Carolina, Tennessee, and Arkansas already have announced the name of Vicksburg, Rosecrans's, and the auspicious moment seems to have arrived to strike a great and mortal blow at the rebellion, and to gain that decisive victory which is due to the country.
> Let the gallant officers of so many brilliant battle-fields accomplish this achievement, and a fame the most glorious awaits them. The commanding General calls for a firm and united action of officers and men; and, under the providence of God, the army of the Potomac will have taken the great step towards restoring peace to the country and the Government to the rightful authority.

A furious storm of rain impeded the proposed advance of the army, but a statement received from the South assures that General Hooker had crossed the Rappahannock. The state of the Federal army, which is reported to amount to 135,000 men, inclusive of the reserves under General Siegel, is unsatisfactory. The men lack their old enthusiasm and self-confidence, are dissatisfied at not receiving their pay, and openly express their want of confidence in General Burnside.

On the 18th a small fleet left New York for some point South. It contained two new ironclads, built by Mr. Ericsson. These vessels, the Nahant and Weehawken, arrived safely in the Chesapeake after a boisterous sea passage.

The Confederate authorities have ordered that Federal officers captured after Jan. 1 be held in custody up to the Government of the States where captured. General Halleck has ordered that no more Confederate officers shall be released on parole.

The Federal steamer Columbia ran ashore at Masonborough Inlet, North Carolina, and her commander and crew surrendered to the Confederates.

In the West the Federal hospital authorities report that their total loss at Murfreesboro' was 1,604, including wounded, missing, and sick.

The Federal gun-boats continue their career of success in Arkansas. They have penetrated 300 miles up the White River, and have captured four more forts thereon.

On the 16th ult. a body of Confederates attacked the Federal relief and store ships proceeding up the Cumberland River in Tennessee, and succeeded in capturing five steam-boats laden with valuable commissary stores and the gun-boat Skiddi. The negro crews were stripped of their clothing, tied in pairs, cowhided, and left to starve on shore.

WASHINGTON.

The House of Representatives has rejected all that portion of Mr. Chase's financial project which relates to the substitution of a uniform Federal currency for the present bank circulation.

The President, after signing the bill for the emission of 100,000,000 dollars in Treasury notes for the payment of army and navy, sent a message to Congress begging it to pass Mr. Chase's financial schemes into law. The message was resented by the Senate in an attempt at dictation.

A series of resolutions have been introduced in the Senate by a California senator denouncing the French occupation of Mexico as a violation of international law and of the London Treaty of October, 1861, and requesting President Lincoln to negotiate a treaty with Mexico, in order to give more effect to the principles expressed in the resolutions. The New York papers, while approving of the spirit of these resolutions, consider the tendency to them ill-timed and impracticable.

The correspondence between the Mexican Minister at Washington and Mr. Seward has been published. The former complains of the unchecked shipment of arms and munitions from New York to French account. Mr. Seward's defence is that, as there has been no declaration of war between the States and Mexico, the Federal Government do not attach to such a state of things. The Mexican Minister next complains that his side is not allowed to export arms from New York. Mr. Seward explains that this embargo results from a municipal law which forbids the export of arms from the United States at this crisis. The Mexican Minister withdrew the American Government with cringing to France.

The Washington National Intelligencer publishes eight columns of intercepted Confederate despatches, being letters of instruction to Messrs. Mason and Slidell, and other Confederate agents in Europe. The most important part of the correspondence relates to the movement on the part of the French Consuls at Galveston and Richmond to induce Europeans to evade the Southern Confederacy and establish an independent Government. The result of this discovery was an order to General Magruder to send the Consul at Galveston to Mexico as soon as possible, and the British Consul to leave Norfolk. The order, however, with regard to the latter was rescinded. It further appears that Mr. Slidell was offended by the appointment of Earl Russell. The Confederate Secretary of State complains of the arrogance of many British statesmen as one cause why England is so little loved, and concludes with the unpoliteness of Earl Russell with the courtesy of M. Thouvenel.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The inaugural address of the Governor of Delaware expresses strong Union and Emancipation sentiments, and favours a vigorous prosecution of the war. The message of the Governor of New Jersey is still more hostile to the Administration on Emancipation than was the message of Governor Seymour, of New York.

The tone of the Northern mind is more nervous and desponding than at any time since the commencement of the war. The Democratic hostility to the emancipation policy is daily making itself more troublesome, and the tendency to open violence is increasing. The New York Legislature has been unable to organise. The candidate of the Republican party for the Speakership has been openly threatened with assassination on the floor of the House by members of the Democratic party. A mob of "rowdies" from New York city have been present in the galleries of the House of the Legislature. The Senate has requested Governor Seymour to call out the militia to protect the Legislature from the terrorism of the mob; but the Governor refuses to act against the most active spirits of his party. Similar scenes have taken place at Trenton and Harrisburg, the capitals of New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

Gold had advanced to 50 premium.

INDIA, CHINA, AND AUSTRALIA.

We have telegraphic news in brief from India, China, and Australia, and also by the overland mail from Bombay to the 14th of January.

The Indian news is not important. The Jyntesh rebels on the north-east frontier of Bengal were said to be increasing in strength and assuming offensive warfare. A large increase in cotton cultivation is reported, but the crops have suffered much injury in many places owing to the want of rain. Feroze Shah has been captured in Cassera by Major Eld. A missionary conference has been held at Calcutta on the 2nd, which, it is said, will lead to a new Indian Bible.

The rebels are strengthening Nankin. They are supposed to be in distress through the want of supplies. Rumour leader is about to take Nankin for Chingchow on hearing of the interference of the Russians.

The explorer Stewart has returned to Melbourne. The shipments of gold since the departure of the last mail amount to 1,125 ounces.

We learn from Holland that Herr Franssen van Depster, member of the Second Chamber, has been appointed Minister for the Colonies.

Michelet's recent work, "La Sorcière," has been placed in the Papal "Index Expurgatorius." It had previously been banished from France.

The Viceroy of Egypt has received a deputation of the European inhabitants of Alexandria, who presented a petition requesting his intention of introducing into Egypt a series of liberal reforms.

A mournful catastrophe occurred at Harpersville, in the State of New York, on the 12th ult. Seventy ladies and gentlemen were skating on a pond, when the ice gave way, and twenty-seven were drowned.

General Baynaud, who not long since took part in the affairs of Electoral Hesse, and who had been dismissed from his functions in consequence of an affair of honour, has just blown out his brains.

The English and French commanders at Corfu have ordered the cessation of all work on the fortifications and of all repairs. Orders of a like nature have been issued, it is stated, in the other Ionian Islands.

Garibaldi has quite got rid of his doctors, but he cannot yet walk about without the aid of crutches. M. Basile, who was in attendance upon him until the 31st of last month, thinks that he will be able to ride on horseback in about a fortnight.

Mr. C. H. Gunn, lecturer on English literature at the Municipal Collegiate Institution of Amsterdam, and Mr. J. Venning, of the University of Utrecht, are lecturing on English literature in Amsterdam. The University of Utrecht supervises all lectures in Lancaster's Hall. At the conclusion of the first lecture contributions to the amount of about £15 were offered.

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegrams have been received through Mr. Reuter's office :—

COCHIN-CHINA.—Paris, Feb. 5.—The Pays of this evening says :—"An insurrection broke out in Cochin-China on the 17th of December last. The natives attacked the French at Saigon. The enemy, being twenty times more numerous than the small expeditionary corps, succeeded in penetrating into the interior of the fort, but were subsequently energetically repulsed. An enemy points the cannon the wrong way round, and not a man remained unwounded. The Annamites fought with incredible boldness. They left a number of killed on the field and more than 2000 prisoners. The greater part of their wounded remained in the hands of the French, and the Annamites received a good lesson."

The Patrie has the following additional news:—"On the 27th of December the Cochin-Chinese attacked Fort Mytho, but were repulsed with 200 killed and wounded."

THE INSURRECTION IN RUSSIAN POLAND.—Cracow, Feb. 5. Kinlee has been occupied by the military. An Ukase has been issued to have captured a cart containing arms belonging to the public treasury. A well-organised band of insurgents is stationed between Kurow and Kosmine. The frontier guard near Sosnowitz was treacherously disarmed by the insurgents.

BERLIN, Feb. 5.—According to intelligence received here from Warsaw, an unsuccessful attempt has been made to poison Marquis Wielopolski and his family.

The Nord Deutsche Zeitung of to-day states that a large parcel of arms destined for Warsaw has been seized at a railway-station near Thorn.

Mr. Willes, the recently-appointed Judge of the British Consular Court at Yeddo, left for that port on the 2nd inst.

Mr. Gresham Wiles, of the firm of Wiles and Brown, brewers, of Cliffe, near Lewes, had a son and heir the other day sold was drowned.

The East Cowes gasometer exploded on the 28th ult. The bellringer, Mr. G. B. Bellew, and a son of Mr. Strickland, the steward of Parkhurst prison, were killed.

A gentleman named Mowlem has erected a handsome building in Swanage, in the Isle of Purbeck, for a library and reading-room, and presented it to the town.

During the past month 4888 emigrants left Liverpool for various parts of the world; being 2718 in excess of the exodus in the corresponding period of last year.

The Glasgow theatre was burnt down on the morning of the 31st ult. The building was insured for £5000, and the contents for £4000. The cause of the fire, which broke out in the property-room, is unknown.

The mail-steamer which leaves Liverpool for Halifax on Saturday (to-day) will have among its passengers more than a hundred poor persons, whose expenses will be defrayed by Miss Burdett Coutts.

Mr. R. M. Ball, of Liverpool, has resigned the chairmanship of the Liverpool Underwriters, having accepted the office of chairman of the British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company.

At a meeting in the Mayor's parlour at Manchester, on the 29th ult. after speeches by Mr. Hibbert, M.P., Mr. W. R. Wood, Canon Sowell, Mr. R. Ainsworth, and others, it was resolved to establish a Cotton Supply Association, the necessary steps for the purpose to be taken by the local committee. The Bishop of Oxford preached the sermon.

Our Melton correspondent writes thus :—"Goddard is engaged to hunt Tooley and Hawk Goodall assists him. Tooley is to ride his last year's horse, Trollope and Mr. Tuthby have had a succession of satisfactory runs. We are quite full of men and horses, and I see the stable expected this week are to be placed, I know not."

A prisoner in a clever escape from Preston House of Correction on the 28th ult. His cell-door had been left open accidentally, and this tempting opportunity was seized. He managed to climb a wall 30ft. high by means of a rope, and then drop down a distance of 20ft. on the other side. A look at the cell of it.

Mr. Levesque Gower was elected, on the 5th inst., to represent Reigate in Parliament in the place of the Hon. Mr. Monson, who is called to the House of Lords by the death of his father. The numbers were—Gower, 344; Wilkinson, 335. Both the candidates were Liberals.

A meeting was held at Rochdale, on the 3rd inst., for the purpose of voting the thanks of the inhabitants of that borough to the American merchants and others for the noble part they have taken in the unemployed Lancashire operatives. Mr. Bright addressed the meeting in a speech which we do credit to the author of the war in America, and he received a hearty response to his eulogium. The hon. gentleman was warmly received.

Negro emancipation meetings have been recently held at Bradford, Stroud, Bury, Leeds, and other towns, at which resolutions expressive of sympathy and admiration of the gallant struggle of the Federals have been enthusiastically carried. At Bradford more than 4000 persons were present, the resolution was put at the public meeting tendering thanks for the contribution from the Northern States for the relief of the Lancashire distress.

At the annual meeting of the supporters of the Great Yarmouth Sailors' Home, held on the 29th ult., Captain Manners, R.N., moved the adoption of the report, adverted to the extraordinary fact that 240 shipwrecked sailors had been otherwise provided for in the Home during the past year, and that 150 shipwrecked mariners have been received since the 1st of January. These facts are eloquent as to the necessity for maintaining this useful institution, which is open to all nations.

The result of the voting by circular of the members of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce with respect to the belligerent rights of the South question has been announced. The report of the scrutineers showed a majority in favour of the resolution's amendment on the subject, with the numbers of 1 blocked or 726 votes, and a majority in favour of Mr. Spence's amendment not to alter the laws of nations in the case of the war. A large number of the 726 members composing the chamber only 69 voted at the meeting to discuss the question, but they had the circulars in their hands at the time of meeting.

During the past week some members of Parliament have been whetting up their rifles for the national practice by taking easy contests with their constituents. A public dinner was given to the two members for Hereford, Mr. Clifford and Mr. Clive Dale Unett, Secretary for the Home Department, on the 29th ult. About two hundred gentlemen were present. Both the members spoke upon the subject of rifles, and were well received. Mr. E. W. Martin and Mr. Serjeant Kinglake, accepting the invitation, addressed the electors of Bridgwater on the 2nd inst. in the Corn Exchange, Rodster. At the close of the hon. members' speeches, which were received with a favourable review of the past session's proceedings, a vote of thanks was moved to them.——At a meeting of his constituents, at Glasgow, on the 2nd inst., Mr. Baxter defended his position as neutrality which, he said, America's Administration had pursued with regard to the American War, and expressed himself in favour of some policy more liberal. The meeting received a vote of thanks and confidence.——Mr. Frederick Peel addressed his constituents at Bury on the 2nd inst. in a speech of considerable length, in reference to the conference at Paris, and a vote of thanks at the termination of the proceedings. Mr. John Bright, at Rochdale, said he could not understand the emancipation decree as a war, rather than a philanthropic, measure.——In the city of Edinburgh, on the 3rd inst., Mr. Hodgson, M.P., advocated the recognition of the Southern States.

A NEW ROUTE TO INDIA.—The new communication between New York and San Francisco, via Nicaragua, which was opened two months since, and has been temporarily interrupted by the loss of a large carrying one new river steamer, will be resumed on the 4th of March. A recent telegram from San Francisco to New York announces the arrival there from Hong-Kong of the first of a line of British steamers destined to ply between China and California; and in connection with this evidence of Pacific enterprise we revert to Nicaragua as that route to our Pacific possessions which offers the greatest inducements to British commerce and emigration. Twelve hundred miles between Southampton and Vancouver, which is the distance saved by the Nicaraguan route, is a great economy of time and of distance, and we do not doubt that the travellers and merchandise which will no longer be restricted to the monopolies of the Pacific Mail and Panama Railroad Companies.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The Zoological Society are preparing tanks for some white whales, 12ft. long, which are being brought from the St. Lawrence.

The election of an Alderman for the Ward of Langbourn, vacated by the resignation of Mr. Cubitt, the late Lord Mayor, closed on the 26th ult. in the return of Mr. Waterlow.

The repair and decoration of Marlborough House, the town residence of the Prince and Princess of Wales, are being pushed forward as rapidly as possible.

The new wards for the reception of Jewish patients were opened at the Metropolitan Free Hospital on the 29th ult., in the presence of a large and influential assembly.

The distress in Spitalfields has become very great. The relieving officers have been nearly overwhelmed with applications for parochial relief; and on Saturday last a meeting was held at the Vestry-room, attended by a large amount of private attention. Committees of gentlemen have been formed to distribute relief in the various districts.

The friends of the Metropolitan Commercial Travellers' and Warehousemen's Association held their annual festival on the 31st ult. at the London Tavern, when Mr. Alderman Lawrence, the Lord Mayor, Schomberg-house assuming to about £100 were announced. The report set forth that the Fund had been raised at the end of last year to upwards of £2,000.

A crowded emancipation meeting was held in Taylor's Repository, Commercial-road, on the 30th ult. The meeting was chiefly delivered by Mr. George Thompson, and the resolutions were carried by acclamation. The conference meeting, consisting of those who could not obtain admission to the building, was held simultaneously, and the same resolution of sympathy with President Lincoln in his anti-slavery policy was adopted.

The Law Amendment Society, at its meeting on the 2nd inst., passed a resolution emphasizing of the omission of Lord Brougham's name from the Commission to inquire into convict discipline. Subsequently, Mr. J. S. Lefevre read a paper on the discipline of the English Bar. He considered that the exclusiveness of its members in some quarters advocated a revision of the rules by which it is governed.

At the last meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works some conversation took place as to the railway bridges and railway works that burrow in the earth or soar in the air in the metropolis. The chairman (Messrs. Cubitt) stated that he had had communications with railway men and backing London to place, as they seem disposed to do, and it was agreed that a representation should be made by the Board of Works on the subject.

An interesting reunion among a large number of deaf and dumb ladies and gentlemen took place on the 31st ult. at the Sussex Hotel, Bayswater-street, the occasion being the celebration of the new year by the Israelitish General Lord Stanley of Alderley, Sir Rowland Hill, of the Post Office, and several other gentlemen were present. The working of the system was so satisfactory to those present, the letter-bags brought up by the North-Western Railway, which left Euston-square, Liverpool, at 8 o'clock, and reached the post-office when conveyed in the usual way, having been blown through the telegraph tubes in 20 minutes. Many other interesting experiments were carried on on the occasion, and they said that they felt no ill effects from the lightning-like rapidity of the transit. The company propose to carry their tube to the General Post Office.

Last week the births of 2111 children—1123 boys and 988 girls—were registered in London. The average number registered in the years 1853-62 the average number (corrected) was 2026.——The death in Lady Yarde Buller, declined to 1315. Last week 1400 deaths had been registered 1400 in every week, except one, since the first week of November, when it was 1397. The deaths at the last week of November, when it was 1397. The deaths at the last week of November, but that of old people was greater. The deaths of persons above 70 in the last week were 202, and of these 70 were above 80, and they were 292. The average number of deaths in the ten weeks of 1853-62, corresponding with the last week of December, was 1,466. ——On the 14th ult. a widow died in the age of ninety-two, and another at ninety-six years.——The case of a boy named Joseph Mark Cohen, residing in Bevis Marks Synagogue, from a wound in the head, caused by a shell falling on him from the mantelpiece. The boy was taken to the London Hospital, and was visited by the London Hospital from a scratch in the hand. If they bleed but the smallest quantity of blood, they are in danger of dying from the consequences of their tragic diathesis.

A meeting of the Royal National Life-boat Institution was held on the 31st inst. A letter was read from the Archbishop of Canterbury expressing the pleasure he experienced in becoming one of the vice-presidents of the institution. The report stated that during the year 1862 the crews of the society's life-boats stationed at Cuxtor, Pakefield, Trimston, Lytham, Moelfre, Rhyl, Barrow, and Aberdovey, the latter for saving, during the late fearful gales of wind, the following shipwrecked crews:—Schooner Kenia, of Sunderland; brig Ellen, of Whitby; brig Ann, of Sunderland; brig Dundee, 12; ship Lonlon, of Bristol, 26; barque Rubie, of Liverpool, 12; smack Ida, of Yarmouth, 7; schooner Ellen, of Fowey, 5; barque Bervale, 5; and the ketch Neatrs, of Berwick-on-Tweed, 3. Rewards to the amount of £213 10s. were also granted to the crews of the life-boats stationed at Yarmouth, Caister, Portheovel, Pakefield, Southport, Selsey, and Blakeney, for putting off to the assistance of vessels in signals of distress with the above different vessels, but which had either got out of danger or had their crews taken off before the life-boats reached them. The life-boats had been launched throughout the late fearful gales, not a single accident having happened either to the life-boats or their crews. We are happy to learn that a handsome gift was presented to Mr. William John, farmer, in acknowledgment of his gallant conduct in rescuing from the wreck of the schooner Ellen, of Fowey, 5 of the crew of twelve men from the Russian barque Henri Sorensin, which, during a gale on the 13th ult., was driven ashore at Hornsea, Yorkshire, on the night of the 10th ult. The society also voted £1 each to the three other men who assisted Mr. John in the rescue. Various other rewards were also voted for saving life from different wrecks. During the past month the society's life-boats were called out by signals of distress with the following vessels:—The Lord Nelson, of Liverpool, and the other at Newhaven, in lieu of a smaller boat which had been previously launched, but which had put back in consequence. The institution were reported at the meeting :—£210 from the late Mr. Thomas Brassey, contributed by his executors; £100 from Mr. T. B. Miller, a Lincoln farmer, of Bestree; and £500 from Mr. T. A. Venables, of Worcester, intercepted a portion of the legacy duty. Various other contributions and life-boats of the institution on their recent visits to life-boat stations on various parts of the United Kingdom. The subscriptions since the 1st inst. amounted to £1700 having been made on various life-boat establishments, the proceedings terminated.

A Cadiz telegram says that yellow fever has almost disappeared from the capital of the Canaries.

Messrs. Whitney and Hathaway have purchased at New York the steamer Ariel, which is to be employed in the Galway and Liverpool Holyhead mail service. The price paid was an average of £2180 for each vessel, whereas the Ariel cost £30,000 to build.

A prize rifle-shooting match was recently held at Shanghai. The first prize was a challenge cup, value 100 guineas, presented by Mr. R. G. Alston, to be won by the best shot among the volunteers. The cup was won by Private Cain, formerly a member of the Exeter Rifle Corps.

In memory of the late Prince Consort Queen Marie of Naples at Augsburg, a silver medal has been granted to the Royal Academy of Fine Arts in Venice, and a similar medal bears the inscription :—"Souvenir of the visit her Majesty Queen Marie of Naples paid to the Royal Academy of Fine Arts, Augsburg, Jan. 8, 1863." The mass have received a copy of the medal in gold.

The Prince of Wales's Island (Penang, in the Straits of Malacca, 400 miles N. of Singapore, and 1,000 miles from Calcutta, in the Bay of Bengal, British) in India was recently taken by a cyclal cones by Dr. Mullens. In 1861, there population was 235,000 souls, and the number of communicants were 1079 catechists, 880 churches, 118,893 native Christians, of whom 21,352 were communicants, and 6,000 children in the Sunday-schools.

The message of the President of the Republic of Liberia (Mr. S. A. Benson), received by the last African mail, gives a satisfactory account of the state of affairs in that country. The message first alludes to the circumstances of his recent visit to England, and speaks in grateful terms of the reception he met with from him, and of the liberal contributions made to promote a satisfactory adjustment of boundary and all other questions in which England, from her relations with the native tribes, is interested. Commerce in Liberia. Great virtuance continues to be exercised by the Liberian Government to frustrate the slave trade in the neighbouring territories, and often with considerable success. The people are paying increased attention to the profitable cultivation of the soil, and the production of cotton, sugar, and other articles is likely to increase. Within the last twelve months six sugar-mills have been imported. Iron and coal deposits exist, which it is hoped may soon be turned to account. A conviction is expressed that the war in the United States will cause an immense voluntary efflux of the coloured population of that country to Liberia, and the view is urged as a stimulus to all Liberian to set aside the slave-trade and to devote the English Government would be beneficial as a place of refuge. The notice obtained by the contribution of Liberia to the International Exhibition is likewise alluded to with gratification.

THE FARM.

A very full council of the Royal Agricultural met on Wednesday for the dispatch of monthly business, which was principally in connection with the Worcester meeting. The proposed show ground is in the shape of a wedge, and has been already cleared of its fences; and when allowance has been made for two or three acres of rising ground at one end, which is hardly available except for spectators, it will be a little larger than the one at Leeds. The sires and hunters will have first-class horseboxes provided for them at £2 per head, which will be cheaper and more acceptable to owners of horses in high condition than the alternative system of five-miles trot, and the chance of a second-rate stable in the town. The ten-shilling public are to enter at eight o'clock on the Monday as soon as the judges are set to work; on Tuesday and Wednesday the entrance-fee will be 2s. 6d.; and on Thursday and Friday 1s., which seems a very equitable arrangement. An excellent plan of railway siding is to be put down close by the ground, and the supply of water will be abundant. The show of implements promises to be full, owing to the manufacture of cider and perry, as well as the cultivation of orchards and hops; and a large suit company will probably propose one on the best apples for cider and perry. Amongst the districts that comprehends Rylands, &c., Welsh cattle, and Welsh cobs not more than fifteen hands, and the best hunting sire calculated to get stock up to fifteen stone; while £50 is appropriated to the best cart sire (Suffolk excepted), with the proviso that he is to remain in the county for the next season at a £2 fee. Mr. Lort Phillips, M.P., is the new steward of stock, vice the Hon. William Cavendish, M.P., whose return is rotation; and the friend, London of Mr. H. B. Thompson, M.P., the Journal has been reduced in price from 10s. to 7s. 6d. Several new books were presented to the society, and among them "The Prince Consort's Farms," by Mr. Morton, an invaluable record for all time of "the Farmer Prince," of whom it has been well observed, "in new scenes in this country can almost contemporary with the existence of the Royal Agricultural Society," which failed him in the presidential only the month before he died. The memorial to the late Mr. Jonas Webb has already reached £800; and tenant farmers in their turn are doing honour to the "Tenant's Friend," as the late Mr. Webb was termed, and have raised so far to £1800, a full moiety of which has been subscribed by the "Lids of the Brockleshy."

ANNIVERSARY MEETING OF THE DUBLIN MASONIC FEMALE ORPHAN SCHOOL.

THE Masonic body had a splendid demonstration in the round room of the Dublin Rotunda on the 27th ult. The occasion was the anniversary of the Masonic Female Orphan School, and the building was completely filled with an assemblage comprising the elite of the rank and respectability of the metropolis. A large number of ladies and gentlemen not belonging to the Masonic Order, all the Lodges. The large platform was filled with the members of the body, wearing the insignia of their rank. The enthusiasm and effect, which was heightened by the decorations of evergreens, banners, and devices which ornamented the hall, and the upwards 2000 persons present and there were more than 500 applications for tickets beyond what the place could hold. The platform presented a pleasing picture of beauty.

The Church and Presbytery were united in the two Grand Chaplains, the Rev. Messrs. Bell and Dobbin, and Dean Lee, who, by the courtesy of operative parties, Lord Naas and Sir William Somerville, spoke with the utmost harmony. Sir Edward Grogan, M.P., Sir William Hort, Judge Keogh, and Dean Lee, M.P., all rendered good the cause of charity and fraternity as though they had never engaged in political strife on the floor of Parliament.

The following report was read by the secretary :—

In presenting their report for the year 1862, the governors of the Masonic Female Orphan School have much pleasure in congratulating the subscribers and incoming creations of the members of the Masonic Order in Ireland to provide a home for the children of their deceased brethren, and to educate them with that parental protection of which they have been deprived.

The total income of the school during the year 1861, including the balance from the former year, was £1736 11s. 3d. Of this sum £808 8s. 6d. was applied to current expenses, £500 was invested in Government securities, rendered necessary by the enlargement of the school, and £170 was invested, according to the provision of Grand Lodge, out of the proceeds which had been received by sale of the building of the present schoolhouse, the interest of which is one of the main sources of permanent income which the school possesses. The total receipts of the year 1862 amount to £1456 16s. Of that sum £140 has been invested in the purchase of Government stock, and out of the proceeds of the additions made to the schoolhouse in 1861, the residue, amounting to £1234 16s., so far as it would go, was applied to the current expenses of the school during the past year, which amount to the sum of £1210 15s. 6d., including payments of £200, the cost of the building of the additions to the schoolhouse.

There are thirty-five girls at present in the school, the number of pupils having been increased since the last annual meeting by one only. At the last election there were eighty candidates for admission, and the committee feel that the house is capable of accommodating forty children.

The governors feel assured that their brethren of the Masonic Order will sympathise with them in the regret they feel in having been obliged, in consequence of the state of their finances, to refuse admission to the five on six useful candidates, and will agree with them in thinking that the amount contributed during the past year, although greater than the receipts of any preceding year, represents but inadequately the wealth and indigence of the Masonic body.

The internal management of the school continues to be conducted with the most scrupulous accuracy, under the superintendence of the finance committee, the efficient and attentive matron, and the kind and motherly matron, Mrs. Noble. Any person observing the neat and healthy appearance of the girls must be surprised at the small annual cost at their diet and dress which do not exceed an average of about £11 for each girl. Their progress and proficiency in needlework has been satisfactory to the ladies' committee and Mrs. Noble, who efficiently superintend this important department in female education.

The sanitary condition of the school has been generally good during the past year, and the governors return their warm thanks to Dr. Speedy for the valuable medical services he has gratuitously rendered to the school during the last fifteen years.

During the year 1862 six girls were admitted to the school. Of those now in the institution twelve are the orphans of brethren of Dublin lodges, whilst twenty-three of them are the orphans of brethren hailing from country or military lodges; and the governors desires to impress this fact on their brethren of country lodges, as the best proof that the school has an urgent claim on their liberality and co-operation.

One of the girls in Australia, one at the Cape, two in England, at the head of large schools, and several in Ireland, as wives or governesses, reflect upon the institution the credit they are themselves to it.

The governors, at the commencement of another year, fraternally appeal to their brethren for a continuance and increase of that support which they have hitherto rendered with such useful and successful results.

Several addresses advocating the claims of the institution having been made, the hon. secretary, Mr. Oldham, read the list of prizes, handing to each of the girls a certificate signed with the autograph of his Grace the Duke of Leinster. The pupils then came forward to receive their rewards, and were enthusiastically applauded. The proceedings terminated by the singing of the National Anthem.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1863.

WHATEVER light may be thrown upon the foreign relations of America by the debates which have recommenced at Westminster, it is certain that the state of the war and the domestic politics of the so-called Union are involved in a haze which at once obscures and distorts the objects it envelops. At this moment the American journals which are supposed to have the best means of procuring information can tell us neither what is being done nor what is wished. It is true that each of the leading papers—cavei canes—is in a manner wedded to a party. When such is the case in England, and when such used to be the case in France, the utterances of party organs were at least frank and intelligible, let them be worth what they might as exponents of truth. But even the party organs in Federalia seem afraid of the crisis, of one another, and of themselves, and anything more helplessly self-contradictory than the united evidence of the American press upon the present condition of affairs can hardly be conceived. There seems only one point upon which they are agreed, although they express their conviction, of course, with more or less reticence, and that is, that the President of the North is a mistake. A certain amount of credit is given to him for being a well-meaning man, but such saving clauses are always followed by an array of proof that all his well-meanings lead to bad ends. The Democrats are naturally the most unsparing in their strictures on Mr. Lincoln. They do not actually invite him to lay down his authority and subside into the country attorney, but they endeavour to impress upon the public that, unless he does pretty much the same thing—namely, abandons all his plans and all his Cabinet—the nation will be ruined. The Abolitionists are bound to praise his proclamation; but they regard it as a brutum fulmen until the war shall be carried on in a way which they evidently consider him unable to point out, or even apprehend; and, indeed, the Tribune seems inclined to give up the game, and proposes that the North shall "bow to malignant fate" if another three months' sharp fighting (again ninety days) shall not have suppressed the Confederates.

We do not yet know how the Imperial Message recommending a conference has been received. But his Majesty's declaration that he proposes to stop the undue extension of Anglo-Saxon dominion in America has given great offence, although circumstances will scarcely permit the Federals to display the anger they feel. We do not attach much weight to a demonstration which has been made on the subject in Congress. It is not to be expected that the North will fly in the face of their former idol and compel him to a recognition for which they believe him to be only too ready. The celebrated Mexican despatch does not come formally under the notice of Mr. Seward, and he will hardly volunteer to take it up; and he may urge that it concerns the South even more than the North. We shall be surprised if this despatch, which in other days would have been answered by a riotous demonstration of Yankeedom, will prevent Mr. Seward from returning a very polite answer to the conference proposal. We may indeed risk the expression of our belief that unless that answer be a direct acceptance of the scheme—an event hardly within probability—it will not very much disturb the present plan of the Emperor of the French.

It is generally believed that the army of the Potomac, under Burnside, is once more to be launched against the Confederates. We have heard of marchings and countermarchings, but we finally read an almost piteous appeal from the Commander-in-Chief urging his soldiery to do something for the honour of the Union. It is scarcely fair to put the matter in this way, and, unless we are misinformed, the army itself sees the unfairness, as well as something else, which it does not hesitate to talk about. The Federals have gone to the slaughter with a courage that makes it shocking to see how badly they were handled by their leaders. Such men under a Wellington or a Clyde would have had another story to tell than one of incessant disaster and defeat. And the courage of the poor foolish hirelings, especially the Irish, who dashed themselves almost upon the guns that blew them away, is undeniable. But the army can have no confidence in such leadership as it has hitherto had, and without confidence in its chiefs an army is a mob. If it be true that the soldiers of the Potomac are once more to be brought up to the defences of the Confederates, instead of being led in a way that offers reasonable hope of success, we see not how such wanton waste of life is to be justified in the face of civilisation.

Meantime we are told that the North is really advancing to victory, for, though defeated in every pitched battle save one, the result of which was only less disastrous than defeat, it is forcing its way in upon the Confederate territory at various points other than in Virginia, and that its attacks are telling upon the resources of the enemy. It is easy to say this, and it may be consolatory to those who are prompt to accept such assurances. But where is the proof? Doubtless New Orleans is in the hands of the Federals (who have done some good there, by-the-way, in compensation for much evil); but the possession of the Crescent City has rather relieved the South of a troublesome and dangerous post than injured the cause of the Confederates. And we know not what else there is to point at as a triumph. On the river the Federals have notoriously failed, and it is thought that the latest failure is still being kept back from the knowledge of the public. But even the enemy "points" made, the sole use of such occupation is to serve as a basis for operations, and it is mere child's play to talk of gain when such gain amounts to nothing but the holding an isolated spot, whence no practical movement can be made. We in England have had, unhappily, too much acquaintance with the real meaning of war to be deceived by the nonsense which passes under another name, but who are profoundly ignorant of the true objects and nature of warfare, though they are singularly prompt at picking up its technicalities. We judge dispassionately, and we are unable to perceive that the war is really making any progress at all; or that what are called victories are more than a series of tentatives, more resembling experiments than strategic achievement. Furthermore, at the risk of offence, we must say that we believe the American public to be hopelessly in the dark as to the campaign; and that, if it were possible for it to reason out by study the strife through the English newspapers, there would soon be a very considerable and different kind from that of any which has yet been reported. Yes, we say it frankly—but without the least intention of wounding sensitive American—the fact is, that the boasted press of the North has proved hollow and rotten in the hour of trial, and when the English press best vindicates its claim to the respect and confidence of the people. The Americans have been content with "smart" journals, and the end of all is that the Union is left at the mercy of ignorance and of dishonesty. May a better state of things arise out of the present dismal chaos!

THE COURT.

The marriage of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales with Princess Alexandra of Denmark will definitively fixed to take place on Tuesday, March 10. THE UNIVERSITIES AND PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—There is an increase in the number of gentlemen taking honours this year at the Cambridge commencement compared with 1862. Thus the number of wranglers is now 37 in 1863, against 32 in 1862; of senior optimes, 22, against 20 in 1862; and of junior optimes, 40, against 31 in 1862; making a total of 99 in 1863, against 83 in 1862. It will be observed, however, that the increase arises from the large superiority in the number of junior optimes. Of the 37 wranglers who have taken honours this year Trinity College contributed 20 (seven wranglers); St. John's, 10 (two wranglers); Clare, 1; Corpus Christi, Christ's, and Sidney Sussex, six each; Pembroke and Trinity Hall, four each; Clare and Emmanuel, three each; Jesus, Queen's, and St. Peter's, King's, Caius, and Magdalene, one each. Jesus and Downing do not figure at all in the list. The senior wrangler, the senior optime, and the senior Mr. Frank Jewett, of Peterhouse, St. John's-wood, and was a pupil of Mr. Routh, of St. Peter's, himself the senior wrangler of 1812. WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of the Right Hon. Charlotte Susanna Dowager Countess of Allesbury, late of Amesbury Abbey, Wilts, and 13, Duke of Park Road, Twickenham, was proved in the London Court, on the 19th ult., by the Right Hon. Philip Henry Lord Viscount de L'Isle and Dudley, the sole executor. The personalty was sworn under £140,000. The testatrix was the second wife and relict of the late Earl of Allesbury, who by his will executed her will, together with a codicil, on the same day, June 3, 1852. Before us it made to all previous deed or instrument in favour of any of the children, and by a former marriage, to which conveyance her Ladyship has added a further sum of £4000 upon trust for the children of her daughter, the late Lady Lucy Herbert, and several articles and family relics are to be held as heirlooms. Legacies are left to her servants, and the residue of her property is bequeathed to three ladies—the Hon. Adela Fitzclarence, the Hon. Emmeline Sidney, and the Hon. Philippa Fitzclarence, all spinsters.

The will of Mrs. Anna Phillimore, of Old Steyne, Brighton, formerly of Newcastle, Hertford, was proved in London under £140,000, the executors nominated having been sworn in Parliament Street. They are Joseph William Trurup, Esq., of Upper Brook-street, Grosvenor-square, Mrs. Paul Jones (now the widow of Alexander Phillimore, Esq. The testatrix died on the 20th of December last, having executed her will in 1856, adding three codicils thereto, all bearing date the 14th of Aug. last. She bequeaths, in trust, a sum of £16,000 for the benefit of the widow of her late brother, William Wyke, Esq., and for their children; and has left legacies to other of her relatives and friends, and also to her servants, appointing her son, William Brough Phillimore, Esq., residuary legatee, who takes all the real estate. A legacy of £200 is bequeathed to the poor of the hamlet of Ratlet, Herts.

The will of the late Sir George Bowyer, Bart., of Radley House, Berks, has only just been proved. The testator, who was a Roman Catholic, executed his will in 1858, which was attested by Hugh Fraser, Esq., Attaché to her Majesty's Legation, and Mr. C. Sawyer, Esq., of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law, Chambers; and Sir James Clarke, Bart., M.D.; Foster, Esq. The testator's family are all Roman Catholics. The amount of cash to which is appended a codicil, dated 1860. After stating that he had settled the annuity of £250 for the benefit of his nephew, Alexander Clark Forbes (the only son of the testator's late brother, Sir John), he continues: "I am desirous during the life of my said nephew, by dispose of several legacies and annuities to nieces and other relatives, and to my friends and servants." He, together with the real estate, passes to the testator's said nephew, Alexander Clark Forbes, during the intermediary and surviving military legatee.

LENDAL BRIDGE, YORK.—(To the Editor.)—In your description of Lendal Bridge, in your last Number (see your Journal, my name is mentioned in a way that may tend to my prejudice in the same way who are unacquainted with the circumstances alluded to. Permit me, then, in your next Number, to add that the girders of the bridge were designed, erected, and fixed by myself, and were in the hands of the contractors. The accident arose from want of strength in the centre of construction of the girders, but from the slipping of some of the temporary struts used by the contractor in the erection.—Richard Dawson, 19, Bridge-street, Westminster, Feb. 3, 1863.

A bill has been introduced in the Legislative Council of India to legalise all marriages of Christians in India contracted since 1851 in the presence of persons not in holy orders, and to prevent all doubts as to the legality of Dissenters' and native Christians' marriages for the future, caused by the decision of the House of Lords that the English common law applies to Indian marriages. As native Christians in thousands are scattered over parts of India under charge of pastors of their own race, far from clergymen and marriage registrars, persons are to be appointed for this class to register in a simple manner such marriages. In the event of a couple to be so married wishing, during Christmas, they are to be subject to the Christian law of affinity and consanguinity, and polygamy is not permitted.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The fifth Session of the present Parliament was opened this day by Royal Commission. The absence of her Majesty deprived the proceedings of the interest which usually attaches to them; notwithstanding, there were a large number of strangers present to witness the ceremony. The Strangers' Gallery was filled with ladies, and a considerable number of Strangers' Gallery was filled with ladies, and a considerable number of Foreigners occupied seats on the back Opposition benches. The Royal Commissioners occupied seats on the back Opposition benches. The Royal Commissioners were the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Argyll, the Earl of St. Germans, Viscount Hardinge, and Lord Stanley of Alderley. The only Peers in the House Viscount Hardinge, and Lord Stanley of Alderley. The only Peers in the House in addition to the Commissioners were the Earl of Camperdown, the Earl of Carlisle, and Lord Berners.

The Commissioners took their seats in front of the throne at two o'clock, when the Usher of the Black Rod was commanded to summon the Members of the House of Commons to hear her Majesty's Speech, as follows:—

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

Her Majesty commands us to inform you that since you met last assembled she has declared her consent to a marriage between his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and Her Royal Highness Princess Alexandra, daughter of Prince Christian of Denmark; and her Majesty has concluded the treaty with the King of Denmark, which was laid before you.

The constant interest which her Majesty has received of your attachment to her person and family persuade her that you will participate in her sentiments on an occasion interesting to her Majesty and which, the Royal Highness trusts, will, she trusts, prove so conducive to the happiness of her family and to the welfare of her people.

Her Majesty feels not that you will enable her to make provision for such an establishment as you may think suitable to the rank and dignity of the Heir Apparent to the Crown of these realms.

A revolution having taken place in Greece, by which the throne of that kingdom has become vacant, the Greek nation have expressed the strongest desire that her Majesty's son should accept the crown of that country. This unsolicited and spontaneous manifestation of good will towards her Majesty and her family, and of a due appreciation of the benefits conferred by the principles and institutions of the government which has called for it to be highly gratifying, and has been deeply felt by her Majesty. But the diplomatic engagements of her Majesty's Crown, with other treaty obligations connected therewith, have prevented her Majesty from yielding to this general wish of the Greek nation.

Her Majesty trusts, however, that the same principles of choice which led the Greek nation to direct their thoughts, in the first instance, towards his Royal Highness Prince Alfred may guide them to the selection of a Sovereign under whose auspices the kingdom of Greece may enjoy a career of internal prosperity and of peaceful relations with other States; and if in such a state of things the Republic of the Seven Islands should desire a separation, which is to be sanctioned by the Sovereign of Greece, her Majesty would be prepared to take such steps as may be necessary for a revision of the treaty of November, 1815, by which that Republic was reconstituted and was placed under the protection of the British Crown.

Her Majesty's relations with foreign Powers continue to be friendly and satisfactory.

Her Majesty has abstained from taking any step with a view to indues a cessation of the conflict between the contending parties in the North American States; because she has not yet seen that the object which either may seek could be attended with a probability of success.

Her Majesty laments that the intelligence concern the desolating warfare which still rages in those regions; and she has witnessed with heartfelt grief the severe distress and suffering which that war has inflicted upon a large class of her faithful subjects, but which they have endured with exemplary noble fortitude and with exemplary resignation. It is some consolation to her Majesty to be led to hope that this suffering and this distress are rather diminishing than increasing, and that a crop of unusual magnitude and excellence is to take place in the manufacturing districts.

It has been a source of great satisfaction to witness the abundant grace testify with which all classes of her subjects in all parts of her empire have contributed to relieve the wants of their suffering fellow-countrymen; and the liberality with which her Majesty's colonial subjects have on this occasion given their aid has proved that, although their dwelling-places are far away, their hearts are still warm with unabated affection for the land of their fathers.

The relief committees have superintended with constant and laborious attention the distribution of the bounty which has been provided.

Her Majesty commands us to inform you that she has concluded with the King of the Belgians a treaty of commerce and navigation, and a convention respecting joint-stock companies. That treaty and that convention will be laid before you.

Her Majesty has likewise given directions that there shall be laid before you papers relating to the failure of China to carry into effect the treaty, and those papers shall also be laid before you relating to occurrences which have lately taken place in Japan.

ESTIMATES OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Her Majesty has directed that the Estimates for the ensuing year shall be laid before you. They have been prepared with a due regard to economy, and will provide for the reductions of expenditure which were approved to be consistent with the proper efficiency of the public service.

MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

We are commanded by her Majesty to inform you that, notwithstanding the continuance of the civil war in North America, the general commercial state of this country during the past year has not sensibly diminished.

The Treaty of Commerce which her Majesty has concluded with the Emperor of the French has already been productive of results highly advantageous to both the nations to which it applies; and the general state of the revenue, notwithstanding many unfavourable circumstances, has been improved to be consistent with the proper efficiency of the public service.

MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

We are commanded by her Majesty to inform you that, notwithstanding the continuance of the civil war in North America, the general commercial state of this country during the past year has not sensibly diminished.

The Treaty of Commerce which her Majesty has concluded with the Emperor of the French has already been productive of results highly advantageous to both the nations to which it applies; and the general state of the revenue, notwithstanding many unfavourable circumstances, has been improved to be consistent with the proper efficiency of the public service.

Her Majesty trusts that these results may be taken as proofs that the productive resources of the country are unimpaired.

It has been a source to her Majesty to observe the spirit of order which happily prevails throughout her dominions, and which is so essential an element in the due administration of justice.

Various measures of public usefulness and improvement will be submitted for your consideration; and her Majesty fervently prays that in all your deliberations the fear of Almighty God may guide your counsels to the promotion of the welfare and happiness of her people.

The Speaker withdrew as soon as the Speech had been read, and their Lordships then adjourned during pleasure.

THE PRINCE OF WALES TAKING HIS SEAT AS A PEER OF THE REALM.

The House reassembled shortly before four o'clock, when there was an unusually large attendance, owing to the fact that his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales had intimated his intention of taking the oaths and his seat as a Peer of the Realm. Upon the Ministerial bench were Earl Russell, the Duke of Somerset, Earl De Grey, Lord Elgin, Earl Grey, the Earl of Clarendon, Lord Wodehouse, Lord de Mauley, Lord Granville, Lord Wrottesley, and Earl Dudley, who, as mover of the Address, appeared in the uniform of a Colonel of Yeomanry. Upon the Opposition benches were the Earl of Malmesbury, Lord Redesdale, Lord Colchester, the Marquis of Bath, Earl Beauchamp, Lord Hardwicke, Lord Lyttelton, the Duke of Marlborough, the Earl of Lonsdale, the Duke of Richmond, the Duke of Buckingham, the Duke of Manchester, the Earl of Dartmouth, the Earl of Cranbrook, and the Earl of Ellenborough.

Prayers having been read by the Bishop of Oxford, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales entered the House from the Prince' Chamber shortly after four o'clock. He was preceded by Sir Henry Ponsonby, carrying a richly embroidered crimson cushion, and by Sir Augustus Clifford, Usher of the Black Rod, and Sir Charles Young, in his robes as Garter King-at-Arms. He was also accompanied by the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Newcastle, the Duke of Argyll, the Earl of Derby, Earl Granville, Lord Kingsdown, and Earl Spencer; in their robes as Peers; Lord Willoughby d'Eresby, Hereditary Great Chamberlain; and Lord Edward Howard, who represented the infant Duke of Norfolk, Hereditary Earl Marshal.

His Royal Highness wore the scarlet and ermine robes of a Duke over the uniform of a Colonel in the Army, and he also wore the garter and ribbon of the Order of the Garter. As he entered the House the whole of the Peers and remained standing throughout the subsequent ceremony. His Royal Highness bowed his acknowledgments, and, advancing to the woolsack, placed his patent and writ of summons in the hands of the Lord Chancellor. The oaths as Duke of Cornwall, Earl of Chester, Earl of Carrick, Earl of Rothesay and Lord of the Isles were then administered to his Royal Highness at the table by Sir J. Shaw Lefevre. After signing the roll his Royal Highness was conducted to the chair on the right of the throne, appropriated on State occasions to the Prince of Wales. Having seated himself, covered, his Royal Highness again rose and was conducted to the woolsack, where he shook hands cordially with the Lord Chancellor, and then retired by the Peers' entrance to the right of the throne.

The oaths were subsequently administered to the new Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the oldest Bishops present.

Their Lordships resumed at five o'clock.

Lord Harrowby took his seat as a representative Peer of Ireland in the room of the late Lord Dungannon.

The Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, accompanied by the Duke of Cambridge, entered the House as the business was about to commence, and took his seat on the cross benches on the left side of the House.

THE ADDRESS.

The Royal Speech having been read by the Lord Chancellor, and again by the clerk at the table,

Earl DUDLEY rose to move an address to reply, which as usual was a mere echo of the Speech itself. His Lordship, referring to the approaching marriage of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and the country Speech, congratulated his Royal Highness upon his approaching marriage with Princess Alexandra, and expressed a hope that the event would tend to remove to dispirit the gloom into which the Royal family had been plunged by the death of the Prince Consort. His Royal Highness, he felt sure, in the offer of the monarchy of that country to his Royal Highness, he felt sure, in the offer of the monarchy of that country to Prince Alfred was a flattering testimony to the affection which the Continental nations entertained for this country were held abroad, but at the same time he uprosed the course which Her Majesty's Government had pursued in the matter. It must be gratifying to the country generally to find that we were at peace with all the world, and that the only war which was raging was in America. In any view of the matter the unhappy war which her Majesty's Government cordially approved the policy of non-interference would be continued, inasmuch as any interference on our part would be viewed with jealousy by the belligerents, and might lead to a European conflagration. Hitherto the effects of the American War had been severely felt in the manufacturing districts of this country, but the distress had been borne with exemplary patience by the operatives, and he trusted to a speedy termination of the war. He was happy to find that in their power to relieve the distress which had been produced. Having adverted to the Polish question, which would occupy their attention at an early day, he moved an address in the usual form.

The Earl of CRANARD, in a brief speech, seconded the address.

The Earl of CLARENDON said he could not but regret that on which the House now assembled with those which marked the opening of Parliament last year. Last year we had to announce the recent death of a great Royal Personage; but now, instead of using the language of condolence on one of the deepest calamities which could befall a family, we had to congratulate the Queen on what to congratulate her on an event which in every point of view was, and must be a happy one to her Majesty and to the country. It was one in which the country generally. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, by the courtesy of his demeanour, and by the kindness of his disposition, had already by his discretion he had displayed, had already won the affection and regard of all his fellow-countrymen. His Lordship could say for himself that he sincerely wish for his Royal Highness than that he and the Princess he had selected to share his high destiny might long live to enjoy the happiness of which the great far more lasting, as that which had fallen to the lot of his illustrious father. Lord Clarendon then proceeded to refer to the duty he had undertaken to raise to the course which her Majesty's Government had taken with regard to the deposition of the late King of Greece. He was free to confess that the Government had not felt themselves justified in joining in the attempt, however honourable, which had been made by the Allied Powers to induce or to interfere for the purpose of putting an end to the war, but to obtain by their good offices, if possible, a cessation of hostilities. He thought that the course had the two parties themselves to reflect on the miseries and hopelessness of the war in the country. Under the circumstances, he thought the course taken by the Government it was but fair that he should say that they were in possession of facts which, if communicated to the world, would justify interference on their part would have been a judicious step. He differed from the opinion that the continuance of the war in the North had been beneficial at the time had arrived for recognising the Southern States. There were only two questions which could be raised in this country with regard to the American war, namely, where there was no further struggle going on, as was the case when the South abandoned the contest, and when the North had succeeded in subduing the South, or where it was desirable in the interest of humanity that the great Powers should interfere to put an end to the war. He thought that the latter question was the more important, and he was informed that in India and China cotton goods were now selling 25 per cent cheaper than they had been. Large orders for cotton goods of all kinds would be sent to India or China during the coming year with the chance of profit, and he trusted that the result would be that by the end of the present year the loss in wages alone in the manufacturing districts would be not less than £2,000,000. He was glad that the advice to the Queen of Denmark had been unchanged; but, unbounded as it had been, he was afraid that at the present moment the policy of the Government of Denmark in the matter of Holstein was not a judicious one. It was satisfactory to find that there was a slight diminution in the number of paupers in Ireland, but the fact that the emigration from that country was still very considerable showed that the distress there was not yet at an end. The price of cotton goods at Manchester at present rendered it impossible for the Irish to compete with them in the English market to be warned the Government that the country would not much longer submit to a tax so oppressive and unequal in its incidence.

After a few words from Mr. R. Cochrane, Sir J. Hanmer, and Sir P. O'Brien,

Mr. PHILIP HENNESSY wished to express his opinion of the melancholy state of Ireland. Its Government was utterly incapable; its head was ill-regarded with old Whigs, who kept him in the utter ignorance; and its chief Secretary was totally incapable and unpopular. He condemned the policy of distrust, but no poster capable of arousing the attributed the miserable distress of England with respect to Poland, to which he characterised the grossest affront in Her History. With regard to Ireland, he was surprised at the language of Earl Russell as either the basest hypocrisy or the most unpardonable audacity.

Mr. SHOLLETT regretted that India was not mentioned in the Speech. He expressed his cordial approval of the policy of Sir Charles Wood, but hoped that those who had been dismissed from the Council would not be taken into the service of the Crown.

Lord PALMERSTON said that the manner in which the House had received the announcement of the marriage of the Prince of Wales would be most gratifying to her Majesty. The Queen, he knew, looked with much favour upon the proposal to a person he had never seen. His fortunate, for he was sure it would be a true love match. As to the marriage, in the truest sense of the word, we the fairest promise for their future excellent qualities of both parents and of Mr. Disraeli and his assertion of happiness. With respect to the charge of the one of restless intrigue and the diplomacy of the Government was complete and empirical denial. Interference, he gave it to the most complete and empirical denial. With respect to Greece, the act of the throne to Prince Alfred was a spontaneous one on the part of Greece, and the Government had in their respect for the high qualities of the Royal family, and the straightforward policy of the country, which was the only power that protected the Ionian Islands. With respect to China, the policy of this latter the country was always to protect its subjects. They were not to go with country was always to protect its subjects. They were not to go with country, and Chinese, and the Chinese themselves were wise enough to seek our aid, and, so far from being at war, they were willingly engaging in the trade of the country, and the Chinese Government to protect and develop the trade of the country, and had converted it, from being a jealous and exclusive country, into a friendly and trusting ally. The Government could certainly produce the papers if had promised, and he hoped that a perusal of them would relieve the House's benefit to enlightened hon. gentlemen. Indian, he was happy to be able to affirmed that, so soon as over the Greeks to the Ionian Islands, the Government would at once proceed to cede those islands to France, Russia, and Austria, intimating that in their opinion it was the wish of the Greeks, that it was still a matter for consideration on the part of Russia; but as soon as an understanding was arrived at it would be communicated to Greeks. As for negotiations with regard to the cession of the Ionian Islands for the Duke of Saxe-Coburg would become a candidate for the position seemed by cession of the Ionian Islands, he was astonished at the statement of the hon. Mr. Disraeli, who must know that the Ionian Isles were under the protection of three great Powers, and could not be ceded to separate Legislature, were to all practical purposes independent. The Government considered that the conditions imposed upon the Government, the cession of these islands would be a wise and generous measure; and he felt confident hope that the Government would not be disappointed in its anticipations. With respect to the negotiations regarding Italy and the Pope, he believed would be perfectly satisfactory. He emphatically denied that there had been any change in the policy of the Government with respect to Turkey, for he believed that under the Government Turkey would become more and more powerful and strong, and he did not see how the union of the Ionian Islands with Greece could affect the question. He regretted that the hon. gentleman had thought fit, according to his information, the case was not so bad as represented, although there was certainly a deficiency of rain, but it was not to be feared that the Government interference. It was Ireland would appeal with success to the sympathies of the British in England and Scotland.

A short debate ensued in which several hon. members took part, and the address was agreed to.

The Italian Government has just advertised for plans and tenders for the construction of docks at Leghorn, Ancona, and Naples. They are to be constructed on the model of the best now existing; must be in direct communication with the railroad system of the country, and provided with all carriages and waggons drawn by horses. There are to be general and private warehouses, &c., all accommodation for the carriage of merchandise.

Canadian papers mention that the Lower St. Lawrence was visited last month by an extraordinary shoal of Red fish, which were seen in such numbers as to astonish even the oldest inhabitants. While partridges south, and by the thousands in pigeons in the woods, these fish were seen in such were as abundant in some parts of the river that the vessels had difficulty in making their way through the large flocks, and were easily approached and killed. The whole coils were the terror of the smaller birds, which disappeared when the visitors went on their way. The winter in Canada hitherto has not been remarkable for coldness, but rather for the unusual mildness of weather and absence of snow.

The screw-steamer Cecs arrived at Dublin on the 27th inst., having on board the officers and crew, to number of 150, of the steam-ship Ava, which had been found in the Channel in a disabled state and unmanageable, having lost her rudder and rudder. Captain Parry, master of the Ava, was to convey carriage to save the Ava, and stood by her for nineteen hours, but was ultimately obliged to abandon her, and shortly afterwards she became a complete wreck as the heavy sea running at the time. The wreck then drifted away with the fury of the gale, and it was from the Ava that the Cecs took a valuable cargo, principally consisting of rice and teak, worth about £70,000.

A portion of a Russian polar expedition of discovery which had been sent out for the last four years to discover, if possible, the lost vessel Vessel, has returned, except the Arkhangel, which became wedged in the ice, and was given up for lost. The commander, Captain Brusnieff, made his way to Spitzbergen, escaped to land by hugging from one ice-floe to another. There they were hospitably received by a tribe of friendly Samoyedes, who gave them warm clothing, reindeer, and horses, by means of which they reached Archangel in safety.

A correspondent of the Nord, writing from St. Petersburg on the 18th inst., says:—"This being the Russian Twelfth Day, we have had the blessing of the waters of the Neva in grand style. As usual, the character of the ceremony was so much marred as religious ceremony, by the presence of the military, that the civil schools were present. The noise of drums was mingled with the music from the church. The Emperor and Empress, with the Imperial family, were on the grand stage boxed covered with crayola. The clergy left the palace by the door by the grand entrance, and the official corps assembled to witness announce the moment when the holy cross was plunged into that part of the stream that is set aside for the purpose. Just as the clergy left the palace before the Emperor and Empress gave their annual grand ball at the Winter Palace. Twelve hundred persons were present, and the supper was served in the Hall of St. George, the windows of which look out upon the Neva, whose frozen surface was illuminated by a numerous array of variously-coloured lights. Many visitors refreshed like an immense mirror the splendid illumination of the scene.

The 25th of January was the day of the ceremonies that were gone through shortly before and after the death of his Highness Maharajah Sree Mooltar Rao Bahadoor of Puttealah, about which we spoke on the 16th of November, when the Maharajah was in the agonies of death, pre-Hindoo ceremonies, which to different people are of different degrees of interest. 700 prisoners from the gaols, and 100 cows, 200 rupees cash, and a large quantity of grain, clothes, and grain were given away by the order of the Rajah. About four o'clock on the day of the death the corpse was removed from the palace; the bearers, carriers, and all the officials connected with the removal of the remains to the funeral pile, which was constructed of sandal-wood. Two hundred pounds of ghee were laid over the body; and, when the pile was ready, having been carried between the intention of the pile, the whole was quietly consumed, and the next day the bones were collected, and the ashes removed. work. On the third day the ashes of the late Maharajah were conducted with great state and ceremony to the Sutlej. Offerings of gold, ornaments, silver, horses, one palanquin, one maiker, 100 shawls, and a considerable sum in cash were given to the Brahmins who officiated at the funeral ceremonies. It is universally believed was his late Highness that the people of Puttealah did not cook their bread for three days, until the ashes of the Maharajah were consigned to the Ganges.

The Imperial library of St. Petersburg, says Galignani, has just purchased a collected collection of Hebrew manuscripts, which was formed by M. Firkovitch, a Caraite himself, who is well known for his scientific zeal. He has, during fifteen years, made numerous journeys in Palestine, the Caucasus, and at Constantinople, had collected the memorials of Jewish nation in the world. He could find them, at the cost of much time and often at the risk of his life. (The Caraites are a Jewish sect, opposed to the traditions of the Talmud.) The collection consists of 47 manuscript rolls of the Pentateuch, 77 collections of the Old Testament, 23 translations in Eastern languages, 372 Caraite and 329 Rabbinist works, 509 historical letters or documents, 722 fictional inscriptions, and 300 plans of the ancient fortresses of New Russia. It also contains 114 authentic manuscripts of the Old Testament, of which 21 are anterior to the sixth century. According to the opinions of MM. Tischendorf, Saint Bohrer, Chlebnikoff, and Chodzko, no European library possesses Hebraic manuscripts of so early a date, and, consequently, the collection is the most rich materials for the composition of a text of the Old Testament, or present so much historical and geographical information upon this Crimea, the Caucasus, the Greek colonies of the South of Russia, &c. A detailed history of the collection is in progress.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK

(From our City Correspondent.)

THE late advance in the rate of discount by the directors of the Bank of England having checked the outflow of gold to the Continent, Home Securities have shown more firmness during the present week, and prices, generally, have been well supported. The transactions for Money have been far from extensive, and those for the Account have fully increased. From the circumstance that about £80,000 in bullion has been sent into the Bank, and that the Consols for India have produced £600,000 in bills on the Indian Presidencies—those on Calcutta at 1s. 1¼d., on Bombay and Madras at 2s. the rupee—remittances to meet the money market may be considered unusual.

The applications for accommodation, both at the Bank and in Lombard-street, have been moderate in amount; therefore, there has been no relaxation in the rates demanded even for the best commercial bills.

The rates of discount are as follow :—

Thirty to sixty days' bills, 4 to 4 per cent.	Four months'	.. ..	3½ to 4 per cent.
Three months'	Six months'	.. ..	3½ to 4 per cent.

The Stock Exchange capital is offering at 4 per cent, and the Joint-stock Banks continue to give 4 per cent for money at call, and 4¼ per cent if with security.

Nearly £700,000, chiefly gold, has come to hand from various quarters, and the supplies continue to be large from the Australian Colonies.

The premium on gold at New York has advanced to 50. The exchange for Ireland has come easier, and the demand for remittance to the Continent and to this country; consequently, the next two or three packets are expected to take away specie.

On the 3rd proximo, the Reduced, New Three per Cents, and Long Annuities will be transferable without the dividends. The transfer books of Bank Stock will be closed on the 17th of March and reopened on the 8th of April.

The Bank of England return for the week ending Jan. 31 is very half-yearly meeting. The dividend declared was equal to 5 per cent per annum.

The Bank of England return for the week ending Jan. 31 is very half-yearly meeting. The dividend declared was equal to 5 per cent per annum.

The following return shows the state of the note circulation in the United Kingdom during the four weeks ending Dec. 13, 1862 :—

	Bank rate. per cent.	Open market. per cent.		Bank rate. per cent.	Open market per cent.
Bank of England	4	3½	Amsterdam	3	2½
Paris	3	2½	Turin	6	5½
Vienna	5	4½	Hamburg	3	2½
Berlin	5	4½	Hamburg	3	2½
Frankfort	4	3½	Petersburg	5	4½

Bank of England	£19,235,198
Private Banks	3,230,309
Joint-stock Banks	4,337,437
Scotland	3,179,037
Ireland	6,798,153
Total	£36,781,114

Compared with December, 1861, the above return shows a decrease in the circulation of £1,284,886, and a decrease of £1,284,886 in the Joint-stock and Scotch banks was £4,665,006.

The Foreign and Colonial Indian Securities on Monday were only moderate a prices, however, ruled firm :—Consols for Money realised 92¾ ⅞ ; Ditto for Account, 92¾ ⅞ ; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 92¾ ⅞ ; Long Annuities, 8¼ ; Bank Stock, 218 to 220 ; Five per Cent Annuities, 108 ; Ditto Bonds, 9s. to 10s. prem. Very little change took place in Exchequer Bills, which were 1s. to 2s. prem. ; India Bonds, closed at 93¾ ; Ditto for Account, 93¾ ; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 92¾ ⅞ ; Long Annuities, 8¼ ; Bank Stock, 218 to 220 ; Five per Cents, 108 ; Ditto Bonds, 9s. to 10s. prem. Very little change took place in Exchequer Bills, which were 1s. to 2s. prem. ; India Bonds, 93¾ ; Ditto for Account, 93¾ ; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 92¾ ⅞ ; Exchequer Bills, 2s. dis. to 2s. prem.

During the week ending to-day that the Duke of Coburg had consented to become a candidate for the Greek throne, the market for Greek Bonds has been somewhat active, and prices have improved ½ per cent. The following are the prices :—Spanish Securities continue firm ; otherwise, the foreign house is steady :—Brazilian, 97½ ; Buenos Ayres, 6 per Cents, 84 ; Chilian, 6 per Cents, 1853, 103½ ; Chilian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 84 ; Equador, 17 ; Egyptian, 99 ; Mexican Three per Cents, 35½ ; Ditto Deferred, 19 ; Ditto Certificates, 19 ; Ditto Three per Cents, 35½ ; Moorish, 94 ex div ; New Granada, 29½ ; Peruvian Six per Cents, 1849, 97 ; Ditto Three per Cents, 1853, 72 ; Ditto Four per Cents, 67½ ; Portuguese Three per Cents, 1862, 47 ; Russian Five per Cents, 1862, 102½ ; Ditto Four per Cents, 1862, 92½ ; Ditto Deferred, 91 ; Ditto Passive, 37½ ; Ditto, Certificates, 93 ; Turkish Old Six per Cents, 84 ; Ditto New Six per Cents, 1862, 84 ; Ditto Four per Cents, 1862, 67½ ; Ditto, 1854, 101¾ ex div ; Venezuela Three per Cents, 23½ ; Ditto, One-and-a-Half per Cents, 1861, 13½ ; Ditto Deferred, 6 ; Ditto Bonds, 1862, 13½ ; Ditto Coupons, 1862, 13½ ; Ditto, Certificates, 10½ ; Indian Five per Cents, 70 ; and French Rentes, Three per Cents, 67 50.

Joint-stock Bank Shares have been in fair average request, and prices closed steady. The following are the quotations :—Australia, 41 ; Australasia, 77½ ; Bank of Egypt, 23½ ; Bank of London, 103 ex div ; Bank of Queensland, 3½ ; British North American, 23 ; Chartered Bank of India, 20 ; Imperial, 19½ ; London and Brazilian, 31 ; London, Buenos Ayres, and River Plate, 19½ ; London Chartered Bank of Australia, 20 ; London Joint-Stock, 16 ; London and Country, 3⅞ ; London Joint-Stock, 3½ ; London and Middlesex, 2½ ; London and South-Western, 3½ ; National Bank of Scotland, 13 ; New South Wales, 3½ ; Oriental Corporation, 6½ ; Provincial of Ireland, 8½ ; Oriental, 5¾ ; Ottoman, 3½ ; Ditto, New, 19½ ; Provincial of Ireland, 8½ ; Provincial of New South Wales, 3½ ; Union of Australia, 54 ; Union of London and France, 7½ ; Union of Ireland, 10 ; and Union of London, 32½.

Miscellaneous Securities have been moderately dealt in, and prices are as numerous :—Canada Six per Cents, 1877-84, 102½ ; Ditto, Five per Cents, 93½ ; Ditto, Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 1878, 90 ; Ditto, Four per Cents, 1859, 83 ; Brunswick Six per Cents, 103 ; New South Wales Five per Cents, 1871 to 1874, 101 ; Ditto, Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 1867, 94 ; and Victoria Five per Cents, 1875, 101.

SCENE FROM "THE TRIAL OF EFFIE DEANS" AT THE THEATRE ROYAL, WESTMINSTER.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

PRINCE ALFRED.

In our Journal of this week we give a Portrait of his Royal Highness Prince Alfred, the second son of her Majesty, whose name has recently been so much before the public: firstly, in connection with the offer to, and refusal by, the Prince of the crown of Greece; and, secondly, in consequence of his promotion a few days since to the rank of Lieutenant in the Royal Navy. Prince Alfred was born at Windsor Castle on the 6th of August, 1844, and is consequently in his nineteenth year. His early education was intrusted to the Rev. H. M. Birch, and in 1852 he was transferred to the educational care of F. W. Gubbs, Esq., C.B. In 1856 he was placed under the special care of Major Cowell, B.E., and passed the winter of 1856-7 at Geneva in the study of modern languages. Her Majesty having decided on the Prince entering the Royal Navy, he proceeded to Alverstoke, near Gosport, where he matriculated at the Rev. W. Jolly, he pursued such studies as were deemed a necessary preparation for his future profession, during the summer of 1858. On Aug. 31 of that year, he passed through the regular examination, which it is understood was a strict and searching one, it being the wish of his illustrious parents that he should travel no royal road to learning. Having the rank of naval cadet, he joined the frigate Euryalus, of 51 guns, commanded by Captain Tarleton, C.B., on the 20th of October, 1858; and from that time until the present has gone through the ordinary, really ordinary, routine of service at sea, both in the Euryalus and subsequently in the Ed. Only a few months since he has served not only in the Mediterranean, but on the West Indian and American stations; and although at most places which he has visited, both in foreign countries and the colonies, when he has gone on shore he has been fêted like the son of a Queen, yet when on board his ship he has been treated in every sense as a young officer in the service of her Majesty, and by all accounts has won his recent promotion to the rank of Lieutenant by the precise and customary rules of the service. It is stated that his Royal Highness will be appointed a Lieutenant of the Racoon corvette, which is under the command of his cousin, the Prince of Leiningen, and that he will proceed shortly to join the squadron in the Pacific. Our Portrait of his Royal Highness is taken from a photograph by Mr. F. Joubert.

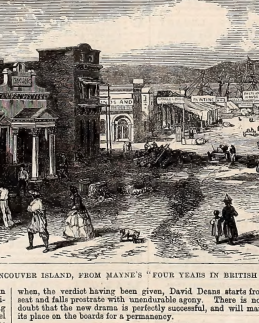
TRIAL OF EFFIE DEANS.

We have already treated at length the subject of Mr. Dion Boucicault's new drama founded on Sir Walter Scott's novel of "Midlothian." But the proper treatment of the theme deserves more than ordinary recognition. Part of this treatment consists in the dramatist perceiving that no sensation scene could be properly in accordance with the argument unless it concerned the trial of poor Effie. There lies the only real point of peril for the unfortunate heroine in connection with her transgression, as well as the crisis of the moral interest. Any hairbreadth escapes encountered by the intrepid Jeannie, amidst ravines and mountain passes and gipsy encampments, belong to another entirely different class of stories in which the merely melodramatic interest is dominant, not to a pathetic tale in which there is some sin and more sorrow and danger arising, especially from moral causes and social arrangements. "Moving accidents," whether by flood or field, are not the primary elements in such an action; but the far more touching phenomena of domestic griefs and civil perplexities, in which the mind rather than the body is threatened. There are the majestic suffering of David Deans, the strict, devout, yet affectionate patriarch of a sinful family; the warm-hearted sympathetic emotion of Jeanie Deans, with her notions of right and spirit of self-sacrifice for her sister's good; and the too-confiding, loving Effie, whose wrongs, both as a wife and a mother, are intensely painful. These interests all culminate in the trial scene. On this Mr. Boucicault has expended great ingenuity. Of the manner on which it is set on the stage our Illustration will sufficiently instruct the reader; on its more dramatic elements it may be expedient to make a few remarks. Mr. Boucicault has aimed at a liberal copy of a judicial proceeding so close to the legal practice that the spectator feels as if present at an actual trial. The author himself acts as counsel for the prisoner, and deports himself as if in an actual court; speaking to the justiciary in confidential whispers, and to the other counsel across the table in low, familiar tones, which are all natural; and then rising to an artificial height in his addresses to the jury. One somehow feels that Mr. Fairbrother is too clever, and that, in making out too strongly a case against evidence, he goes beyond the mark, and yet that, under the circumstances, he is but acting judiciously in daring all extremes, for the case is desperate. There is small hope of the jury not seeing through the forensic artifices employed, and a certainty that the Judge will demolish the cobweb in a moment. In so pointing the scene that the peril is accurately felt by every one of the audience, and relieving the pain that accompanies it by the admission of such humorous accessories as are available, Mr. Boucicault has conducted the latest dramatic feat. He shines, therefore, in this scene, both as an author and an actor; and it is impossible to conceive a better interpretation in all respects of the characters and the circumstances. Our artist has taken the scene at the crisis when, the verdict having been given, David Deans starts from his seat and falls prostrate with unendurable agony. There is now no doubt that the case was perfectly successful, and will maintain its place on the boards for a permanency.

NEW CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH AT HARROGATE.

THE NEW CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH AT HARROGATE.

Few places in England have made greater improvements during the last two or three years than the fashionable watering-place of Harrogate; and the least of these is the erection of a beautiful Congregational church in the Decorated style of Gothic architecture. The new church occupies a most admirable site at one of the entrances to Victoria Park, facing the Stray, and is a conspicuous object from nearly all parts of Low Harrogate. An elegant spire rises to the height of 130ft. The three principal doorways are of handsome proportions and trefoiled in the heads. They give access to an inner vestibule, from which the wood floor, aisles, and the gallery staircase can be conveniently approached. Internally the church is a parallelogram about 85ft. by 46ft., exclusive of the organ recess, and the height 40ft. The span of the roof is divided by iron columns, with foliated cape, by which means the centre portion rises to a considerable height, and much novelty and beauty of internal effect are produced. A small gallery occupies the west end of the church, above which is a handsome five-light window, with geometrical tracery. The windows throughout are of varied patterns, and those on the side elevations are surmounted by gables, which very much relieve the appearance of the roof. In the interior the pews are open, with leaning backs, and are wide enough to satisfy the most fastidious followers of modern fashion. Two handsome brass coronas, each of thirty lights, with subsidiary brackets, light the church. The minister's and deacon's vestries conveniently adjoin the church, and form, along with the school and class rooms, a block of buildings in the Early English style in the rear, which group well with the general design. Separate entrances for the boys and girls are provided, with all requisite conveniences. The church will conveniently seat about 700 people, and the school 200 children. The site is inclosed by a low fence-wall and handsome Gothic railing and gate, and the flagged footpath is five yards in width. The works have involved an outlay of about £6000. Messrs. Lockwood and Mawson, of Leeds and Bradford, are the architects. The whole has been erected under the able superintendence of John F. Clapham, Esq., J.P., who has spared neither time nor trouble to see everything properly executed. The foundation-stone of the church was laid by Sir Francis Crossley, Bart., M.P.



A STREET IN VICTORIA, VANCOUVER ISLAND, FROM MAYNE'S "FOUR YEARS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA AND VANCOUVER ISLAND."

INDIAN WOMAN AND CHILD OF VANCOUVER ISLAND.

BRITISH COLUMBIA AND VANCOUVER ISLAND.

So many conflicting accounts of the British possessions in North-west America have reached us that we hail with pleasure a manly, sensible book just published by Murray—"Four Years in British Columbia and Vancouver Island," by Commander R. C. Mayne, R.N., F.R.G.S.

Commander Mayne is no mere holiday tourist, who, as he hurries from place to place, sketches the external characteristics of each, and offers the reader, eager for facts upon which conclusions may be safely formed, impressions which are not only valueless but often delusive. Leaving England in 1857, as Lieutenant of H.M.S. Plumper, the author's four years in British Columbia and Vancouver Island were spent in penetrating their forests, exploring their fertile valleys, opening up their rivers, and making charts of their coasts. Commander Mayne's official duties do not seem to have rendered him familiar with the great goldfields of the Fraser. But his experiences are not less likely, for this reason, to be useful to the intending settler. For, while the search for gold will attract thousands to the shores of the Pacific, there can be no doubt that the majority of those who hurry to the mines will, growing dissatisfied with the hardships and uncertainties of a digger's life, turn their attention to the rare commercial and agricultural resources of the country. It is to this section of reaction, indeed, which so many fear, that Commander Mayne, with the interests of the colonies in which he has so long laboured at heart, looks forward hopefully.

The Plumper reached Victoria, the capital of Vancouver Island, before the existence of gold upon the adjacent colony of British Columbia was dreamt of. His account of the town in its old sleepy days, and its excitement when the discovery of gold upon the Fraser River attracted ships of all flags to its harbour and filled its previously quiet streets with the representatives of almost every nation under the sun, is most interesting. Land that a few weeks back had been of little value rose suddenly to a fabulous price; the small traders of the town became great merchants, their wooden stores expanding into imposing warehouses; the lately barren shores of the harbour were covered with wharves, on which ships laden with every description of articles which the new population could require discharged their cargoes; while the Governor who yesterday was administering the uneventful affairs of an almost unknown colony found himself at once the responsible ruler of an important British possession upon which the eyes of the whole world were turned. In the labours of Governor Douglas and his small staff to meet the exigencies of his position Commander Mayne, with the other officers of the Plumper, took an active share, and a very interesting account of the early growth and rapid development of the new country will be found in the pages of his book.

Its chief value lies, however, in the full and perfect account which the author has given of the natural advantages of the two colonies of British Columbia and Vancouver Island. In his surveys and travels Commander Mayne seems to have kept his mind fixed upon the coming time when the dense forests shall give way to the backwoodsman's axe, and the plough be driven from end to end of the fertile valleys. The facts he has collected respecting the natural resources of the colonies are most valuable, but we have only space to quote a brief summary of them, drawing attention, in the interest of intending settlers, to the warning with which his words of promise end:—"In concluding this rough summary let us repeat that in our North American possessions we have, independently of its mineral wealth, a country of immense extent and natural beauty,—for so far as it has been tested—invariable fertility, and with a climate closely resembling our own. Against these advantages, however, it must be remembered that all that is required to develop and utilise the many natural advantages of the colonies has yet to be done, and that for many years to come about hearts and strong hands will find abundant occupation in accomplishing this work. He who is not possessed of these requisites of a bush life is as unfit for British Columbia as for any other colony; but the man whose heart does not fail him at the prospect of hard living and harder work will find there welcome and plenty awaiting him."

Commander Mayne's book is well written. Without neglecting the interests of readers, who, above all, require a book to be amusing, he has produced a work in which the student will find much valuable information, and to which the intending settler may with safety resort for a full and impartial description of his new home.

Of the interesting sketches with which this book is illustrated we can only say a few words. These are descriptive of the aboriginal inhabitants of the country, respecting whom many interesting and amusing details will be found in Commander Mayne's volume. In explanation of the strange custom of flattening the skull, as shown in the Engraving of the Indian girl, he writes:—"The Indians of Vancouver Island all have their heads flattened more or less. Those who have only seen certain tribes may be inclined to think the sketch of this girl exaggerated; but it was really drawn from measurement, and she was found to have 18 inches of flesh from her eyes to the top of her head. The process is effected while they are infants, and it does not seem to interfere with their intellectual capacities."

THE LIVERPOOL TUBULAR LIFE-BOAT RESCUE, RECENTLY LAUNCHED.

THE National Life-boat Institution having decided to station a new life-boat at New Brighton, Liverpool, the 24th ult. witnessed its launch. Previous to the launch of the boat it was taken in procession through the principal streets of the town, and it is calculated that between 60,000 and 70,000 persons turned out to see it. Both the marines and blue-jackets of H.M.S. Majestic and a large body of the Naval Reserve followed. Next came the local committee, amongst whom were many of the first merchants and shipbrokers of Liverpool. Mr. Ewart, M.P., one of the members of the borough, was present.

SYRIAN CATS PRESENTED TO THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON BY THE PRINCE OF WALES.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

The procession, which was wound up by a fine body of volunteers, was joined at the Townhall by the Mayor, and, when the life-boat had reached the pier, after an appropriate address from Mr Worship, a chaplain of the fleet offered up the success of the boat, and she was christened the Rescue by the Mayoress, Mrs. Gardner, and then launched. Everything in connection with the launch of the life-boat passed off most admirably under the able superintendence of Captain Ward, R.N., the institution's inspector of life-boats. The Rescue entertained a large and distinguished party in the evening at the Townhall. After the usual loyal toasts had been given and drunk with much enthusiasm, the Mayor proposed "Prosperity to the exertions of the National Life-boat Institution." He dwelt on the truly national and important character of the operations of the institution, and in particular claims it had on a town like Liverpool. He sincerely hoped that the Life-boat Institution would long continue to render essential service to the cause of humanity, and would be conducted on the sound principles that now distinguished its operations. Mr. Richard Swire, barrister-at-law, and one of the secretaries of the National Life-boat Institution, in reply to the toast of "The Institution," gave an interesting account of the origin of the society, and pointed out how it had succeeded, and narrated several striking instances of the benefits it had rendered during the past year in rescuing 356 lives from a watery grave. He stated that the operations of the institution were not confined to England for their unostentatious liberality in presenting the costs of life-boats to the stations abroad.

The Rescue is constructed upon what is known as Richardson's patent iron life-boat principle, and is the second life-boat of that description adopted by the Life-boat Institution, the other being stationed at Hilpi. She was built by Mr. John Hamilton, of the Waddon Foundry, Liverpool, and is of 25 tons, the dimensions of her very handsome stamp and cut. She is 42ft. in length, with 10ft. beam. The specialities of her construction consist in the iron bulwarks which extend from stem to stern, with fourteen water-tight bulkheads. As we have said, the washstrake and gunwales are formed of one piece of wrought iron, the shape of an angle bar, with the vertical flange turned inwards, and open ending in the bottom of the boat, so that any water which the boat may ship over the side or otherwise will immediately pass through the boat.

THE SYRIAN CATS (FELIS MANICULATA) IN THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY'S GARDENS, REGENT'S PARK.

The Council of the Zoological Society of London in Regent's Park have lately received a valuable addition in the shape of a pair of wild cats, presented to the society by Royal Engineer Officer Captain Burton.

These animals are of interest not merely on account of their Royal donor, and from the fact that they were captured in their native haunts in the neighbourhood of Damascus, but from their extreme rarity in the East in the spring of last year, but also as being the first examples of the race which have exhibited in a state of captivity a menagerie. They are considered to belong to the Felis maniculata or Syrian cat, and the well-known German traveller and naturalist Ruppell, as also his predecessors, have described, but without reason, to have been the origin of the domestic cat of Europe. Judging from the general appearance there seems good reason for doubting Ruppell's views on this subject are correct. It is often supposed that the common wild cat of Europe Felis catus of Linnæus was the stock from which our cats were originally derived. But any one who is acquainted with the two species will allow that the Eastern animal, in colour, shape, and especially in voice, is as far from the cat as it is nearly resembling the domestic animal.

Tame cats of the brownish tabby colour, and with the red-brown stain which distinguish the Syrian animal, are of by no means uncommon occurrence.

It is singular that, while the Syrian cat is now so well represented in the Zoological Society's menagerie, there is no specimen in it of the common wild cat of Europe, although it is found in Wales, and, as far as we are informed, has any example of this now scarce and, as regards street Britain, almost extinct animal been received by the society for nearly twenty years. It would be to the power of any of the animals in the less frequented parts of Europe to obtain a living specimen of the true wild cat, and, if they could, the difficulty of transmission would, we have no doubt, be very acceptable, and would afford opportunities for the more easy comparison of the European with the Eastern species.

"BLOWING BUBBLES." PAINTED BY W. HUNT, IN THE WINTER EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

We remarked recently, when describing the "Flycatcher," by Mr. William Hunt, which we also engraved from this exhibition, that the English country boy has been almost as favourite a subject of this artist's genius as his more still-life drawings of fruit, flowers, birds, and that Mr. Hunt paints the young urchins with more evident relish than anything else. We endeavored, at the same time, to point out in many aspects and situations in which the little hero of rustic life has been presented to us by the painter. But although Mr. Hunt discovers the boy in almost all the most unlikely and unpromising places and under circumstances which would have made the representation hopelessly ugly to other hands, yet our picture of the whole race of these young humpkin has never lessened our respect for the painter. The unfinished drawing now engraved is another proof of the truth of our remark. Nothing can be more thoroughly true to the character, or nothing can show more convincingly the possession of rare powers of observation and expression in the artist. Look at the round-eyed elder and bigger boy than our fierce young friend "the flycatcher." He has still more cottgrown his clothes; witness that creased and ragged, tawny-coloured waistcoat, which we now, or newly sketched (if ever submitted to that operation) and freshly put on, must look like a fresh-cut field. And look at the wistful witness those short corduroys, with the "knees" stretched with long wear, and also, please to observe, considerably frayed. The whole position of "bear-pan" or patella. This boy, too, is still more of a truly unpoetical clay-covered clodhopper. We don't believe his shoes have ever been touched since they left the cobbler's hammer, likewise, some will say is stupid and senseless compared with the art and science of the flycatcher's toilet. But we would not have it altered. Did not Sir Isaac Newton blow bubbles long after he was a grown man? Are we not all, metaphorically at least, blowing bubbles? Have we not all, more or less, been fascinated by the like? Who, in wonder at, and transfixed with admiration of, those fairy globes, pleasantly floating in the sunshine, complete with all the prismatic hues like the opal, and ever and anon vanishing like spirits? We regret that Mr. Hunt has not painted the bubble in the picture. We should like to see how he would manage it with the magic of colour would have rendered those beautiful crystal spheres.

It is difficult to think of such a picture as a young lout, as some would call him, as this. However, although we may safely say that Sir Isaac's theory of the different refrangibility of colours never troubled his head in the least, he has surely concentrated in the effort to keep up that bubble. For the painter indicates that the bubble has lost its equilibrium, and that it sinks under the weight of water, do so till more water has subsided down its sides, and the rarified air inside has expanded anew. So a little external force is necessary, and the boy, like a true practical philosopher as he is, prepares to blow with all his might, and distends, as an anatomist would say, his buccinator or trumpeter muscle to the very utmost. Why, he sinks before the descending bubble, but only to favour his delivering a long and a strong puff. In fact, the matter is the sole of his shoe, he carries out the proverb "Recular pour mieux mauter." As, in his intense preoccupation, he squints over his nose at that fragile emblem of "reputation," wealth, wisdom, and wit, and pinkers up his mouth into a small white star to toss it upwards to be for a moment the sport of the wind, and then to triumphantly blow it up to the skies! Why, he forgets the brittle pipe, the bowl of which slips round downwards in his relaxed fingers; and he is spilling even his precious soapsuds. He cares no more for us, friends, than we care for him. He is but a bubble for our amusement, and we are but bubbles for his. All are but bubbles and blowers thereof, and so shall it be till the greatest bubble bursts, and "this great globe and all which it inherits shall dissolve."

IMPERIALIST EXPEDITION TO FUNGWHA.

A RECENT Number contained the announcement of the capture by an Imperialist force of Pungwha and Kahding, two towns in the neighbourhood of Ningpo, held by the Taepings. A. D. McArthur, Esq., Master of the ship Encounter, at Ningpo, has obligingly placed at our disposal some sketches in connection with the expedition to Pungwha, from which we have selected two—the Landing at Fanghow Bridge (engraved on page 135) and a general view of Pungwha, taken from a pagoda over the approach to the east gate, during the bombardment (engraved on page 134). Mr. McArthur has also supplied us with the following details of the expedition:—

H.M.S. Encounter, Ningpo, Nov. 4, 1862.

For many days the country to the westward of Ningpo had been in a continual state of excitement. Pungwha having been taken by the rebels, it was reported that the Taepings would advance in myriads upon Ningpo, and the whole of the country people, who had been in a state of terror for months past, were utterly appeared in the neighbourhood, burning, looting, destroying, and committing every species of atrocity and barbarity that could be thought of. The terror and crossed over to the settlement, leaving their homes to the mercy of the ruffians following in their wake. Numbers of the fugitives, on the approach of Taepings took flight to Shanghai. Every preparation was made to give the Taepings a warm reception should they attack; but, from their commencing and finishing they could not approach without incurring much risk, some of their horsemen being wounded by the fire from the walls, but fortunately the enemy did not again upon Fungwha. From this it was necessary to dislodge them, as the rebels had possession of the city, and the whole neighbourhood around threaten Ningpo at any time during the winter. The following expedition was accordingly organized. The force consisted of Ward's force, which is under command of Colonel Forrester; two American mountain guns manned by Chinese artillerymen; twenty-five seamen and marines of the Encounter and the Sphinx to support Chinese troops; three howitzers, with 150 rounds of shell, from the Encounter and the Sphinx. The artillery left Ningpo at 9 a.m. on the 8th of October, under very disadvantageous circumstances, the weather being very unfavourable. On arriving at the creek at Hurly, with Captain Dew on board, led the way. Her mate had been previously sent on shore to reconnoitre for the rebels, and when he got up if she passed under the first bridge (Fanghow), above which the river is narrow, she would be fired on. She was followed by the Encounter's French steamer, and Confucius, Chinese steamer, all towing boats, with troops, munitions of war, provisions, &c. The country on both sides of the water of the rebel advance became painfully manifest; swollen corpses floated past on the tide, lying or sitting on the banks, a fine specimen of the manner of the dogs which swarm in the villages; few other signs of life were to be noted—the occasional crouching figure of a wretched native, half-starved, who looked on with callous indifference as we sped by. At noon we reached Fanghow Bridge. What a change there was in the aspect of the villages lying in a horrible heap, their crime having been refusing to carry provisions for the rebels, and consequent punishment by wholesale. On the ninth of a heavy shower of rain the landing took place, and the boats with the guns, &c., proceeded up the river to the east gate of the city of Pungwha. The little village was lost in getting the boats past the bridges thrown across the canal, and the fire of the rebels from the walls was very heavy, but without effect across, leaving a very little space beneath. About 4.30 p.m. reached the east gate, and opened fire on the gate with seven rounds of shell, and at 5.30 we arrived at a large place called Nanter, where a halt was called for the night. The enemy had evacuated the town, and the only inhabitants being half-a-dozen helpless old men whom the rebels had thought it worth while to murder. The temple of the Encounters and Spinxes were bolted in a large joss-house—"The Temple of Mirth and Dancing," and soon a large fire was blazing in the centre, and cooking and luxuriating was the order of the night. The officers occupied a raised stage or platform at one end of the yard, which, with the temple, formed the three sides of a square, the fourth being the open roadway. The sentries were posted on each side were gallerys; in front a large hall with bulkheads and doors, and behind a yard with a well, and kitchens and outhouses for cooking and repiled on his salt pork and bread. For our part, we were not beholden to the Commissariat Department, for we had taken care to provide ourselves, and was speedily got up from the boat and opened; but, misericordia! half-a-dozen rats were discovered in the meal, and who could think of the consequences of eating rats that had been feeding on the dead bodies that lay in the river? Our sentries were posted, and all made themselves accomfortable as they could. The enormous fire which had been lighted in the yard threw a ruddy glare on the walls of the city, and throwing dark and sombre shadows into the recesses and corners of the building, the temple of Mirth and Dancing looked more than ordinarily grim in respect and varied colours of the building, reddened by the firelight, formed a wide bright picture, set up in remarkable contrast to the dark and gloomy scene in the behoof of the traveller. The banks of the river, thickly wooded, and the hills beyond, lost in the thick evening mist, formed a suitable and sombre background to the boisterous old bridge. The water here is beautifully clear, and the country being fresh, the Chinese commenced their work of fishing and plucking. The progress of the boats, however, was slow, as in many places the river is shallow, and a few hours' grounding occurred on the mud banks. Over these the boats were got by dint of hauling, and pulling, and lifting; and at 4 p.m. arrived at Kahding. The city is of the same shape as Pungwha, and in a respectful distance were stationed a large body of Imperial rebels, who had arrived a short time before. The enemy's position was found to be in a long, straggling city, lying at the foot of the hills in a plain covered with rice, and intersected with numerous canals. The walls of the city, on the east side, the river rushes past in a clear, pellucid stream, crossed by a bridge of boats, and on the opposite bank is the suburb. On the north between which and the river lies an extensive plain, cultivated with paddy and rice crops about 4ft. high, and on the west is a hill. The walls of the city, about 400 yards in length, the gate being nearly in the centre. A stone bridge, with a fine arch, crosses the canal, and on the opposite bank, in the background to the pontoon old bridge. The water here is beautifully clear, and the country being fresh, the Chinese commenced their work of fishing and plucking. She is built of cedar externally, with the principal timbers of honeysuckle, and a copper fastened. She is partially tubular, with the exception of the keel, both bow and stern tapering to a sharp point, which is of fine copper. The outriggers are similar to ours, with the exception of the rowlocks, which are on a swivel principle, invented and patented by R. Green. INDOOR AMUSEMENTS.

BILLIARDS.

Cleopatra. Let us to billiards:
Come Charmian.
Charmian. My arm is sore, best play with Mardian.

THE above regal request, uttered by the beautiful, yet extravagant, cunning syren and enchantress the Queen of Egypt to her faithful attendant, will cause a wide spread sensation in the minds of many of the lengthened absence of her beloved Mark Anthony, proves that billiards was a favourite and fashionable amusement during that period of time. With the exception, however, of the authority of that poet of Nature, who ever held up a faithful mirror of manners and of life, we have no means of ascertaining whether the more scientific game first found favour at the Court of Ptolemy Epiphanes. According to the most erudite writers on the subject, the game was said to have been introduced by the Chinese; but how it found its way into England is a problem which, as it did not die with the first of the kind, or even among the games in use two hundred years ago, mentioned in the ancient records of London, are "billiards, trucks, bowling, shove with cards, pawn, dice, tables, chess, rowls, queek, nine-holes, fourhes, English ruff and honours, whist, French ruff, five cards, cestle, beggar my neighbour, the high game, with many others, plain dealing, Queen Nazareen, lanthiu, penneh, post and pair, bankafalt, boast, Irish backgammon, tick-tack dubblets, size ace, hetch dotch, in and out." In an manuscript little volume entitled the "Complete Gamester," written in 1674 with a view of exposing the arts of the fraternity, we find a full account of a gambler appears, which is as truthful a portraiture of a professed gamester in the reign of Charles II. as it is in that of Queen Victoria——"He has his cards and dice, and other implements of ply in his hands, others that he will die so; but certainly it is all his life, and what he thinks of more he thinks of not more than he speaks the language of the country, and can be as soldierly as any man else. He knows to judge but the grosse parker, nor he but that of the game at which he is so expert. He loves wine and the manner beyond measure, and frequents taverns, and Christmas more than any other time, because there is more gaming then; he is very ready to lose but loathe to come to the poor's-box. This man will play, like Nero, when the city is on fire or like Archimedes when it is sacking, rather than interrupt his game. If play him not, he is unquiet. He has a set of words and sentences, who fastens upon anything next at hand. Amongst other of his shipwrecks he has lost happy and many a fair estate, and many more. No man puts his brain to more use than he; for his life is a daily invention, and each meal a new stratagem; and, like a fly, will boldly sup at every cup. He will eat and drink a quart of sack or wine for joy to see you, and, in requital of this courtesy, you can do no less than pay the shot. If strangers are like assaulted, you may lose a shilling or two, as he can well dispend, which they lend him, not with the hope of ever having it again, but as some more train him by him at length as they do an infection." The next mention we find of billiards is in an old newspaper, from which we give the following extract:—"The Public Register contains an invitation, printed in November, 1677, from a number of publicans, consisting of billiard-tables, nine-pin-alleys, shuffle-boards, and skittles, which is a worthy magistrate caused to be piled in a pyramidal form, near three feet high, at the end of Bow-street, near the Police Office, where they were quickly set up."

Proceed we now to notice the game as it is at present played, but, before doing so, we must remark that, although some of the above quotations we have included billiards as a gambler's game it does not at all follow that it need be so, as many hundred matches are annually made in this country for the mere prize of the hire of the table, and in private houses for the most trifling sums. Upon a table, or, for the matter of two after dinner, billiards is an indoor amusement that can vie with billiards, for to amusement it adds exercise, and many ways that, were it made an hour round with a stick, turned the "Board of Green Cloth." There is another advantage, which is, that ladies may participate in the amusement, either by taking a game or one, or by looking on, which is not the case with cricket, which may include sides of two each, is a most interesting event, infinitely more so than a game at billiards, and not a rubber of whist. With respect to the tables, there can be no doubt that a vast improvement has been made within the last thirty years. Instead of an uneven surface and cushions, we have the perfectly level slate bed covered with the finest cloth; while the old list cushions, which were as hard as the cue with which they were struck, are superseded by rubber. Among the numerous games usually played in England may be mentioned the Pool, the Pyramid, the Russian Carambole Game, Winning Hazard and Carambole Game, French Carambole Game, the Cyclop ball or American Game, Pyramid Pool, and Pool.

Though billiards is an inherently exhilarating indoor amusement for amateurs, we must not ignore the pleasure to be derived from witnessing the feats of the professors. The most extraordinary of this century there was a billiard-table keeper at Hamburg, who used to back himself to force his ball from one table on to another contiguous to it, and to hole the ball in any specified pocket of the two. But probably the achievements of Messrs. Kentfield, and Roberts, and M. Bergez, surpass anything we have previously recorded. For, to be it remarked, the extraordinary feats of these great players can only be performed with balls, tables, &c., rendered all but perfection by the improvements of modern science, and which, in fact, we have already referred. Hence the delight we experience in playing on such tables as those of Messrs. Thurston and Co., and more especially as Kentfield's, at Brighton; Roberts's, in Leicester-square; and Bergez's, in the Burlington Arcade. For instance, one of the strokes performed by Kentfield is to play a canon all round the table with such dead strength that the second ball, having a sixpence balanced on it, the canon is made to run backwards down the small cushion. Strokes like this, requiring extreme accuracy and delicacy, can only be performed on a perfectly level table. The white ball, which he manœuvres to lay the balls over his pocket after every stroke cannot be described; it must be seen. Kentfield's great feat has played more than fifty thousand games, one pocket to five, with one gentleman alone. Wonderful as is Kentfield's dexterity and knowledge of strength, the execution of Roberts is no less wonderful. It is a quarto tecum whether Kentfield, in his best days, was better than Roberts; and this question we do not intend to discuss. The great merits of both are quite enough to occupy us. We believe that we are correct in stating that Roberts has made the largest break off the balls ever achieved—viz., three hundred and forty-four. He has also scored one hundred and twelve off one ball, the red, by winning 3 cards only; that is to say, he has pocketed the red ball in playing a game one hundred and four times consecutively, without an intervening failure. It is worth while to see him, if only when playing this stroke—the confidence with which he strikes, and the rapidity with which he places himself for the succeeding stroke, starting off the moment the ball is struck, and long before it is in the pocket. The action is more like the measured beats of machinery than that of fallible muscular exertion. We need hardly explain that we have been describing the "spot-stroke," in which Roberts is unrivalled. The fact that Englishmen, players and lookers-on, will we say that there is yet a more surprising player than any we have mentioned—a beautiful boy, Master Mcmanus—is now the great carnal player in Paris, but he has now retired. He is a portly man, and does not look at all as though he could play billiards. His game is "nurse and pull," and he seldom runs over 100. His fancy strokes, though to our fancy not a bit more wonderful than his ordinary game, are more popular with the gallery, and to some extent with amateurs.

We have often heard of screwing round a hat, and we have certain scientific reasons for declining to screw at a table; but Bergez makes his ball describe a bona fide circle round a basket-hipper that is hat, and makes a canon at the same time. Amongst other strokes he screws back the white ball from the top table, and makes it run down to within so close to the one he screws back on, that he can only strike it at the top of the ball. He makes his ball, after striking the red, jump on to the cushion, run on it along the length of the table, and then descend and complete the canon off two cushions. He also cannons the red ball on to the top of the table, and the figure of eight he will draws three curved lines on the cloth and makes what he calls a serpentine canon, which is to say, passes the ball from cushion to cushion of the table, describing curves over the very lines he has drawn.

We merely give these instances of skill, as they are interesting to the amateur billiard-player, but we advise our readers to leave the performance of such strokes to those who have made billiards their study. The amateur is very likely to give the cloth an ugly cut, and even if he succeeds in doing them occasionally he will find that certain social disadvantages will be the result. Let our readers remember that to enjoy billiards as an indoor amusement it is quite sufficient to be able to make a common hazard or canon, and to play moderately, and to play two or three "fifties" up in the course of an hour.

CASTING A LARGE CYLINDER.

On the next page we give an illustration of the casting of a large cylinder, on the 26th inst., at the establishment of Messrs. Jackson and Watkins, Canal Ironworks, Poplar. It is 96in. in diameter, 9ft. 6in. long, and weighs about 4 tons. The process of casting is peculiar for this gigantic casting occupied more than a dozen men, during a period of three hours, and the fluid metal was poured from a giant pig iron, with a proportion of scrap, were melted in about six hours in each of the five cupolas which supply the foundry, and from which the fluid was drawn in the usual way by ladles. The mould, which is made in a frame by powerful cranes to equidistant positions over the mould, the cope is then lowered and secured to the frame by the aid of the cranes. The cylinder is a portion of the steam-engines of 1000-horse power for one of the new steam-ships of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam-ship Company. The engines are by Messrs. Humphrys and Tennant, and are the finest specimens of difficult marine-engine castings ever made, and, we believe, will be the largest ever made by private firms. Messrs. Penn's works possess great reputation for their capabilities of producing a large amount of work, and, in the hands of the former proprietors, Messrs. Seward and Curtis, the Blackwall Iron Works, the construction of large engines for her Majesty's Government. Amongst the tools are to be found some of the largest planing-machines, and also large slotting and planing machines, under which are fitting fitted up some immense forgings for the armour-plated frigates Minotaur and Valiant.

An old unmarried farmer, named Abraham Hershey, died in West Hempfield, Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, last month, and after his funeral a number of bags of gold coin were found secreted in his house.

An adult gorilla has just been received in Paris by M. de Rosnevel. It was sent direct from Gaboon, Africa, in a cask of spirits, and it is in a perfect state of preservation.

On the 2nd inst. salmon-fishing commenced in England and Wales. The season "opens" time out of mind on the same day, and a weekly close time is also now imposed by the new Fisheries Act, extending from Saturday evening to Monday morning, the fishings did not open until the letter day.

The Government emigrant-ship Clara, of 938 tons, Mr. H. J. Barrow, commander, has arrived at Quebec with 1 cabin and 342 steerage Victoria, having on board 76 married couples, 1 single man, 221 single women, 20 boys, and 24 children under 1 year old. Of the 342 in the steerage 214 were in all 345 souls, equal to 230 statute adults, under the care of John Carroll, Esq., surgeon superintendent appointed by the Emigration Commissioners.

A notice has been issued, by authority of the Post-master-General, of the issue of one hundred additional post-office savings-banks which are to be opened on the 1st of March next, one of which will be established in every town in England; also, of forty-six such banks at money-order offices in Scotland; and nearly two hundred additional money-order offices in the United Kingdom in various towns and places in Ireland, at the date referred to. At the beginning of 1863 there were 1,200 savings-banks in operation.

The New York Times of the 17th says :—"Messrs. Clark and Sons, of Cambridge, Massachusetts, have succeeded in making a lens two feet in diameter, which is pronounced perfect by the astronomers of the Harvard University Observatory. That is about 16in. in diameter; this more than 20in. The lens is for the Chicago Observatory, which is building, and annulled the contract. The contract price was about 10,000 dols. It is expected that it will be finished in May next."

The quarterly return of the births, marriages, and deaths for England and Wales has just been issued from the office of the Registrar-General. The returns for the quarter ending September 30 show that the marriages for the quarter that ended in September last year. There is a decrease in the number of marriages solemnized in the summer months, and so to outweigh an increase in London and elsewhere, and reduce the marriages for the whole country below the average. The decrease in the number of marriages has curiously followed the amount of the distress: Ashton, which is in the midst of the cotton districts, returned the largest decrease in the marriage rate, and so in the other towns. The birth-rate for the last quarter of 1862 was 34·4 per 1000 persons living. The deaths were 21,000 less. The mortality was above the average, the principal cause of which is attributed to the cold weather of the last quarter.

EDUCATION IN IRELAND.—The report of the National Education Board for the year 1862 states that children were on the school rolls at some time or other in the course of the year 1862 to the number of 557,000, or 1 in 7 of the population. The average attendance was 284,726. These last two numbers are more by above 20,000 than in 1861. The number of schools under the care of the Board was 5,000, or 1 for every 1,000 of the entire population of Ireland were therefore on the rolls as pupils in 1862, 140,319 Protestants. The Board consider the proportions from the several religious denominations to be nearly the same as in the census of 1861. The number increases, and the proportions are gradually becoming more favourable to the minority. The number of pupils presented and examined in writing 2?4 per cent were able to write on paper fairly; 12?5 per cent to write with ease and freedom. Of pupils examined in arithmetic 6?1 in division of money; 13 per cent in compound rules; 24?1 per cent a more proportion or practice, 45 per cent of the children were above ten years of age. The schools were under the charge of 3,000 assistant-teachers, of all sorts, of whom 801 were male and 2,199 female; and there were 1422 paid monitors.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

It is to be a dull Session, say the politicians of the clubs—although Pall-mall is not infallible in its prognostications;—and her Majesty's Government is not to be trifled with, and devoured by her Majesty's Opposition, unless a specially favourable opportunity should happen to turn up out of the chapter of accidents. The joyous notes of "The Wedding March" will pleasantly drown, we trust, the clamour of faction. Yet Parliament will find an immensity of work of a social nature cut out for them if they only choose to put their hands to it. There is the Convict Discipline question to be discussed and settled. There is the new Night-poaching Bill, which, juvenile as it is, requires something to be done to it. There is the Marriage Law and the embankment of the southern shore of the Thames, any number of new railways, the mismanagement of Dulwich College, the Revised Code to be re-revised, and sundry other matters of general and local interest. Beyond upon it that Parliament will be able to find work enough to do if honourable members are industrious enough to say nothing of that, same chapter of accidents. The Sessions, like the days—are ever,

Just as much as we see in them and no more.

The friends of the negro held a "monster" meeting at Exeter Hall last week—so crowded a one that it overflowed into the Strands of the large hall and filled an oratorical sistern in the basement, and an adjacent tank in Exeter-street. The proceedings were of a most enthusiastic character, and the cause of the Negro, in connection with that of the abolition of slavery—for which last consummation all good men and true must fervently pray—was energetically advocated. The literary element was represented by Mr. Thomas Hughes, author of "Tom Brown's Schooldays" and "Tom Brown at Oxford," and by Mr. W. H. Ludlow.

Mr. Michelet's strange, fantastical, half-erudite, half-gossiping book, "La Sorcière," is about to be published in an English dress in Messrs. Allen. In France the continued sale of the work has been prohibited by the police. In Rome M. Michelet has received the high compliment to find his "Jeanne d'Arc" placed in the Index Expurgatorius—a gentilesse which the congregation of the literary have always been willing to bestow upon the majority of M. Michelet's productions. No little "expurgation" will be necessary to make the book palatable in England; but the use of the pruning-knife may be safely left to the good taste of the translator and publishers. At the same time it must not be forgotten that we are already sufficiently familiar in witch-literature with Mr. Lenton's "Lectures on Demonology and Witchcraft" and Mrs. Linton's (Holme Lee) capital "Witch Stories." leave nearly a void to be filled up; whilst the learned side of sorcery has been exhausted in that pair of Germanic erudition "Emenoser's History of Magic." Much amusement may, however, be derived from M. Michelet's piquant narratives of the causes celèbres of La Demoiselle Cadières and Antoinette Bigeon.

As we have anticipated, last week the real "Blue Mantle," in the shape of Mr. Henry Murray Lane, a duly tabarded Pursuivant-of-Arms, during Her Majesty's pleasure, was formally duly turned up, and administered a stinging rebuke to his pseudonymous colleague, Lancaster, who pretended of the discomfiture of the false herald in "Quentin Durward."

Mr. Boucicault threatens to prosecute any bold dramatist or dramatic author who shall dare to infringe the copyright he claims in the "rearrangement" of the incidents and dialogue of his new sensation drama, "The Colleen Bawn; or, The Brides of Dunore." It is very successful one, and is capitally acted. Still we are under the impression that in our hot youth a certain melodrama, called "The Heart of Midlothian," was played at the Surrey, by Messrs. Jerrold and other metropolitan theatres, and that the late Mrs. Egerton once made a decided success in the part of Madge Wildfire. Again is dramatic faiseur more ingenious and astute than Mr. Dion Boucicault; but a melancholy paucity and barrenness of invention become manifest when we hear of "rearrangement" claimed in the "rearrangement" of a hackneyed melodrama, which, again, was but an adaptation from one of Sir Walter Scott's novels. The "rearrangement" is the property of a Scottish artist. Is there any copyright in this work of art, and to whom does it belong?

A copyright there should be—and a very stringently-protected one, too—in all specimens of the art of photographic topography. The development, its continuance at a high stage of excellence, is very existence, so to speak, are menaced by the audacious encroachments and perilous invasion of photographers. Not only has photography produced a more strongly-secured legal copyright (under a recent statute) than the engravers, but will experience before the old Act of George III., passed mainly for the protection of William Hogarth's wonderful graphic dramas. Piracy, it is true, will batten upon photography, and the proprietors of the "Illustrated London News" have found a local Dundreary (not Mr. Alexander Basano's excellent sun-pictures on a rare scale, but Mr. Sothern's impersonation de vraie) have just been compelled to claim magisterial protection.

Miss Braddon's "thrilling romance"—we believe that is the proper term—of "Lady Audley's Secret," which, as a volume and novel, has gone through eight it not nine editions, has been dramatised, and is to be produced at the Queen's Theatre on the 9th of January, under the auspices of genial and clever Mr. and Mrs. Frank Matthews. Miss Braddon, who has just published another novel, "Floyd" and is writing "John Marchmont's Legacy" in Temple Bar, is about to commence another serial in Once a Week, entitled "Eleanor's Victory." How many hundreds of thousands and how many hours did the Courier of St. Petersburg ride at one time? In All the Year Round Miss Braddon is the ewe of commencing a new story, with the strange title "Very Hard Cash;" and, next week, Mr. Wilkie, Mr. Hain Friswell makes his appearance (ushered in by Mr. Bentley) with a new novel, entitled "The Outcasts of Eve."

We advertel last week to a lamentable catastrophe at the Princess' Theatre. As we foresaw, the accident to Miss Heath is likely to be fatal, and an inquest has been held on her remains, resulting in a verdict of "Accidental death," and accompanied by an expression of opinion on the part of the jury that the ballet-dresses of the ballerinas be henceforward be rendered non-inflammable by chemical preparation while in the manufacture or subsequently; and, furthermore, that proper means and appliances should always be at hand to extinguish the flames should fire unavoidably break out. There is too much reason to fear that the dress of one ballerina was torn off and partly burnt off by a member of the corps de ballet a supply of the anti-combustible ingredients; granted even such is impracticable, and unknown at the rehearsals, something more, we consider, is requisite. At the committee meeting of the Drury Lane proprietors last Saturday Mr. Marsh Nelson, the architect to the Patent Theatres, will be requested to make available suggestions for the prevention of accidents by fire in theatres, and which suggestions formed part of his report to the board in use in Drury Lane. There are no less than 300 gasburners in the building; but every one of them is rendered innocuous by being inclosed in a globe of galvanized iron wire, filled at the top with asbestos, covered by a close iron globe and cover does not exceed 2*s.* 6*d.*, and, at this trifling outlay, almost every gaseous peril is obviated. Mr. Marsh Nelson has also taken care to have plenty of cheap and serviceable hand-pumps in the building, and a proper supply of easily-attainable water. This is a move in the right direction, and we trust, that it will be followed in every theatre on this side of the water. One transpontine establishment already boasts of a steam-fire engine provided for the completeness and compactness of its safeguards against the Fire Demon.

The readings from his own works given by Mr. Charles Dickens in the largest saloon of the British Embassy at Paris have met with an extraordinary amount of success, and seem to have given equal delight to the French, English, and American visitors. Mr. Dickens's first reading was for the benefit of distressed British subjects in Paris; his second in aid of the funds for the relief of Lancashire distress; and now, we believe, he has been earnestly and influentially solicited to read for the benefit of a poor lady who appears to be the last on whom he bestowed a thought—namely, himself.

NEGRO EMANCIPATION: THE MEETING IN EXETER HALL.

As there are currents in the deep sea (well known to the careful mariner) which have no necessary connection with the course of the waves on the surface, and are often diametrically opposed to them, even when these latter appear to be triumphantly sweeping along towards a given destination, so it seems public opinion may at the most critical moments display similar phenomena; and students of political marine will be disconcerted that all the air in trimming his sails to the wind, all his steadiness in directing the helm, do not enable him to baffle or escape from the unseen "currents" down below, which is carrying him he hardly knows whither, but certainly not in the way that he wanted to go.

No event in recent times has so strongly helped to remind us of this well-known, but half-forgotten, truth as the meeting of Thursday week in Exeter Hall. Here has been for many months past pretty well all of one mind as to the American question, that is to say, concerning the Right and Wrong of the matter, and here the "independence" convinced that if the latter did not exactly behave well in the outbreak of the war, it has fought so splendidly since that it cannot be subjugated, and must, therefore, in the end succeed; convinced, finally, that it would be best on the whole to leave slavery at present as it is, in the hands of the masters, as the only way to the progress of humanity, of knowledge of economical laws, and of the absence of irritation through abolition attacks, to do away ultimately with so great an evil. That, we believe, is a fair statement of the opinions predominant generally through society, in accordance with the constant unfolding of nine-tenths of the whole English press.

But of late a new element has begun to be dimly visible. As the Northern Legislature and Administration have become of a more decidedly anti-slavery cast we have heard of small local meetings rising like bubbles to the surface of public opinion, and evaporating with a feeble cry in favour of the slave. Then a few months ago existed surprise that the Lancashire operatives were so quiet under all their sufferings as to call forth but impossible to trace into any active agitation for blockade-breaking; and somehow it began to be whispered about that the explanation of their conduct was that they didn't feel quite so much about cotton as being at the bottom of the whole business of Southern revolt. But when Mr. Lincoln's proclamation of September last, offering compensation to loyal slaveholders up to Jan. 1, and threatening emancipation without compensation on and after that day if they were not accepted—when this broke like a thunder-clap upon the world we entered upon a new and difficult, and anxious period. For, while on the one hand there were but few persons who did not fully denounce such slavery, there were still fewer who did not see that Mr. Lincoln's Government had taken that terrible ground, not because of any love for the slave in the abstract, but because he found the North could not beat the South without doing so. Of course, in saying this we do not say or suggest that Mr. Lincoln was hypocritical, or that he was indifferent to the fate of the character, antecedents, or wishes. We only say, as a matter of fact which cannot be denied, that the previous anti-slavery utterances, such as (among others) the abolition of slavery in Columbia, the anti-slave trade treaty with England, the permanent exclusion of slavery from the Territories, and Congress's offer of aid to the work of abolition by compensation, all obviously sprang from a genuine anti-slavery sentiment. But the Proclamation was the last of the series, as obviously did not, but from the military failures of the North. No wonder, then, that the general current of opinion (having previously been unsettled) should have begun to set strongly on the whole friendly to the South and unfriendly to the North, or that it began to say that Mr. Lincoln's "Right but Wrong Emancipation" would prove in its working a very inhuman measure, as leading to a servile war.

But now there also began to be heard rumours of the formation of some new society—an Emancipation Society—originating, like the old anti-slavery one, in the country and not in the London "fashionable" world. Rumour of supporters began to be handed about, some of them enjoying reputations of world-wide celebrity for philanthropy. More local meetings were heard of—especially in the metropolis. Then suddenly Manchester burst out with an assemblage several thousand strong, at the Free Trade Hall, Lord Brougham and all the others ascribed to prepare for the renewal in their town of the former anti-slavery agitation, and dashed, by an overwhelming majority, to do so, in spite of Mr. Spence, who was present, and made an eloquent, gallant, but unavailing effort to keep out of the resolutions an expression of sympathy with the North. Then, the London press continued to notice the society in leaders, though the notices were not more complimentary than the sneers of the Prince and Princess of Wales' physician, of which the boy so proud, and which consisted simply in the Prince's having to point out of the room.

But whether the Emancipation Society esteemed the honour of being thus noticed more than it felt the sting of the contemptuous words in which the notices were generally clothed, it has steadily through these preliminary meetings, it certainly ventured at last to issue its circular to the "friends of freedom, and especially" to invite "all parties" to the great room of Exeter Hall on the night of Thursday, the 25th of January, 1863. We are careful to record the date; for, if we do not misread the signs then and there manifested, this meeting will prove the turning-point of new and serious political issues. Let us say, at the reader meriting to consider somewhat promising how he need be under no apprehension that we are about to try to influence his sympathies or guide his judgment; we assume only the humbler duty of recording that which we saw, that which we heard and seen; and which he, as an Englishman, knowing how the greatness of our country is by the free exercise of the reason, and honest opinion, and how dependent the true statesman must be upon the accurate knowledge of all such opinion, will, we are sure, be glad to have faithfully related.

Having tickets for reserved seats we do not present ourselves till about ten minutes before the time named on those—about half-past 7, but as we ascend the steps of the portico, we are warned by the streams of people, in all sorts of modes, taking the matter very leisurely. And so we find it when we get our first glimpse of the hall, and hurriedly ask for the seats that were to have been reserved. "Where are they?" we ask impatiently, but meet only with provoking equanimity. The doorkeeper points to the far-distant gallery, high up, and the "Where?" is repeated in a tone of despair. "Why, there"—if he be right, which looks doubtful, it is certain that scores—nay, hundreds—of other persons will be discovering the vacancies long before we can possibly get there. We are helpless as children, seeking rest for the soles of their feet and finding none. There are backward eddies to break through, as well as forward ones to force a place onward; and, as we struggle by we are stopped by a hurrier on the stairs descending into the lobby, where we pant and strive. "No one can pass, sir, for more than half." We plunge once more to the top of the stairs, climb up and up, get over the banister, and find we have, unnoticed, turned the enemy's stronghold. Still in vain, however. Even here are dense masses of people at work, as if it were hard to make the Englishman's last confession and acknowledge ourselves beaten. Again, we come upon a second set of stairs, and make a slight thundering in the same difficult strait, but we obviously must get in. That first rapture is our hope. We appeal to him. He gallantly takes us in tow, shouts "Reporter!" when advance is otherwise impossible, and so we get at last into a sort of little black hole of Calcutta, with the floor at about the level of surface waves and certain of being rinsed if we stay where we are. Here, however, to our immense relief, is a door open; just such a door as we have so confidently forwarded and luckily do not fail; another instant, and we are running up the stairs of the little box or covered way that admits us to the platform, and there find breathing space and full opportunity to drink in, in one wondering, awe-stricken glance, the sublime spectacle of a vast sea of upturned faces, looking towards another sea scarcely less large that, in defiance of all the laws of gravity, has ascended and overflowed every nook and corner of the upraised expanse of the orchestra, leaving only the organ in the centre towering calmly above the exit and sloping tide of life.

But curiously has this nothing mass of humanity begun to grow quiet and satisfied in the pleasant and soothing sense of successful conquest and possession, and to address itself to the business of the night, before we hear distant but mighty shouts below, rumbling like thunder among the valleys to an observer seated high on the hills: and presently it is whispered about that the more overflow of this hall has filled another hall below, and that these shouts are from that second exulting army on taking possession. But even that hall, we soon hear, is equally incapable of dealing with the inflowing streams of people; so, presently, the adjoining street (Exeter-street) is ringing with the tumultuous cheers of a third meeting, held in the open air. Under these circumstances, and with the frequently-occurring incident that I have to, when I have above, were forced to quit and fall back. Those distant reverberations would come up to the ear with a most dramatic and exciting effect from below, it is no wonder that the proper business of the evening went on under a kind of high-pressure system, mentally and morally, and made it difficult for the calmest heads to preserve their equanimity.

Yet is it especially worthy of note (whatever the use made of the fact) that some of the most ordinary attractions helped to bring together a like wonderful gathering. It is probable, for example, that not a few of the eminent statesmen or politicians were here; that few or none of the old and honoured anti-slavery friends were represented; that some of the speakers were men of genius; that commerce sent none of its accustomed representatives; that the clergy were present in considerable numbers. But for that very reason we are driven to confess how great must have been the "ground-swell" of public opinion before it could thus burst up on the surface, and overcome the indifference and fury of the maelstrom and the waterspout, unless, indeed, we accept the solution since offered—that Federal money was the main spring!

The speakers of the evening were the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, Mr. Dudley Baxter, Mr. Henry Richard, M.P., Mr. Miall, M.P., Mr. Newman Hall; Mr. Taylor, the member for Leicester; and Mr. Ludlow. A well-arranged programme was issued, which gave the names of the faces of supporters on the platform one could also distinguish Mr. Bealey, Mr. Lucas; Mr. Victor Schoicher, the French exile; Mr. Morse, the American Consul at Liverpool; and Mr. Hughes, one of the men at nautical science; Mr. Chamerovzow, the secretary of the old Anti-Slavery Society, whose presence served to make the link with the past; this, its vigorous successor; many clergymen, including Mr. Landels, Mr. Town, Burns, Dr. Tidy, and Rylance; and a number of other gentlemen with whom the general public may be more familiarly acquainted.

We should observe that Mr. Baptist Noel modestly acknowledged the force of the sarcasms that have been launched as to the insignificance of their movement, but added, "I would remind you of the great army of emancipation in this country;" and the felicity of the retort was enhanced by the fact that the first business of the meeting was to read the letters received. Then a letter was received from such persons as James Stuart Mill, the first of living political economists; Professor Fawcett, Professor Goldwin Smith, Mr. Hays of anti-slavery and free-trade agitation (and who characteristically inclosed £10 to the society as the best way of helping the Lancashire operatives); Professor Newman, the brother of Mr. Francis, the two most promising of all the independent Liberals recently elected to Parliament; Professor Cairnes, Professor Fawcett, Professor Smith; from Mr. E. Miall, Mr. George Thompson, and several gentlemen of local standing in our chief cities. The emancipation army, therefore, was not without its generals at its formation. What character, or its scholarly guides, whenever it begins to march.

If I did not misread the signs, the leading opposition given to the first sentences from the chairman, the Hon. Mr. Evans, to doubt the loyal temper of the assembled multitude. It was utterly impossible to do so when he referred in a perfectly dispassionate manner to those who wished to see America divided into two confederacies. He was interrupted by "No, no!" "Not a voice for such a proposition and opinion!" and then, as if that phrase had been a kind of electric shock that roused the whole meeting to a sense of danger, hearing apparently only waited for some such signal to relieve themselves from the almost fearful pressure of repressed enthusiasm, which was fast overflowed. This incident told all that any one could have needed to know as to the feelings and views of the meeting. But the fact here to be recorded is the remarkable reception of Mr. Ludlow. "Brother man, a little later, happened to use the words, "Mr. Lincoln's position," when he was interrupted by cheers, and the effect of the President could only have heard them he must have begun to doubt his own identity with the "best-abused" man alive, as he is generally esteemed.

Another incident of the meeting was interesting. Mr. Noel remarked that the Emancipation Society derived its name from the old, but distinctly heard, objected to appropriate that the men of Bradford (which strongly voted at this moment during a similar meeting) and he proposed, to the great satisfaction of the audience, to send a telegram saying, "We are for emancipation and the Union; who cares for Mr. Lincoln?" This was carried with cheers, and when

CHANGES IN PARLIAMENT.

THE vicissitudes which annually wait upon the legislative body of this country have in the past year been singularly in consonance with that of the preceding twelve months. For instance, in 1861 there were sixteen deaths amongst members of the Peerage; and in 1862 there have been seventeen. In 1861 ten members of the House of Commons died, and in 1862 the number of deaths was twelve. In the year before last there were twenty-eight elections of members to serve in the Lower House, and, since the opening of Parliament in 1862 up to the present time, there have been twenty-six new returns. In 1861 fifteen members of the House of Commons voluntarily vacated their seats; while the number of those who retired into private life last year was ten. It is thought that a few details connected with these changes would not be inappropriate at the commencement of a new Session.

In looking in due order of precedence to the Peerage, the first matter which should be noticed is the fact that his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has emerged from the list of Marquises in the House of Peers who are minors, and is entitled to take his seat in the upper chamber of the Legislature. There still remain amongst the inheritors of titles who have not reached the age of discretion the Duke of three Marquises, eleven Earls, two Viscounts, and four Barons. Of the sixteen Peers who departed this life in the year that has also gone there were two Archbishops—namely, Dr. Sumner, who had held the see of Canterbury since 1848, and Lord John George de la Poer Beresford, Archbishop of Armagh, having occupied that arch see from the year 1822, and who attained an age truly patriarchal. The Bishop of Ely has not since made upon any vacancy in its ranks, and only two were made in the list of Marquises. By the death of the Marquis of Headfortune the marquisate which we by heritage of the United Kingdom by that title became extinct, but the creation of Broadlahun in the peerage of Scotland remains, and is now held by a cousin of the deceased Marquis. Within the last few days the venerable and respected Marquis of Lansdowne has been gathered to his fathers, and Lord Lansdowne is a member who it was understood that he was about to be raised to a dukedom—a distinction intended to mark his long and judicious services to the Liberal party generally, and more wholly, and in no especial tenure of offices, but which were performed with great singleness of purpose, and from a pure, honourable and consistent political point of view. He is succeeded by his son, the Earl of Shelburne, who was called up to the House of Peers in his father's lifetime, two or three years back, by the title of Baron Wycombe, and who now takes his place in the House of Lords under the title of Broadlahun in the peerage of Scotland creation, and by courtesy as a cousin of the deceased Marquis. "THE LONG SERMON." PAINTED BY T. ROBERTS.

IN THE WINTER EXHIBITION, PALL-MALL.

HERE is a painter rather fond, we suspect, of preaching—or, rather, counter-preaching. Not long since Mr. Roberts preached, and very courageously and eloquently too, against those tiresome and savage expounders of esthetics' priest art-critics (though we, of course, did not feel the application of his discourse); and now this is not the first time he has held forth to the preachers themselves—the preachers par excellence—who, by-the-way, sometimes tax our patience almost as severely as even the art-critics. But our painter sets the example of delivering on this occasion a very short sermon, and only touches on one or two of the many bearings of his text. His text being a "long sermon," he shows its effect on little more than one pew, instead of on a large part of a whole congregation. Brevity, they say, is the soul of wit, if not of preaching; and may his homily, in virtue of its shortness, have the more pointed and salutary effect!

Mr. Roberts has, moreover, the peculiarity of preaching rather humorously, like certain popular preachers of the present day, who, in their humility, enliven with a little jocularity what they seem to think might otherwise be tedious or unattractive. But assuredly the artist's sardonic mirth is as well-meant and acceptable in his short sermon; as a long sermon from the pulpit, however good the intention, and whether wise or witty, or both or neither, is sometimes unacceptable to poor human nature. It will be observed that the painter restrains himself from direct allusion to the worthy but mistaken pastor who inflicts "the long sermon." We are in the position of many others in those high, old-fashioned, square pews who have not that invaluable aid to keeping up the attention—to wit, the power of fixing a resolute gaze upon the movements and gestures of the minister. We are left to imagine the monotonous voice,—gradually subsiding with our relaxing attention into a long, dull, soporific cadence, rising and falling, gently swaying to and fro, cradling us, as it were, to sleep, and, finally, sinking with our parting consciousness into a pleasant, soothing, far-off "droning, like the hum of many bees," till, in fact—O shame and terror!—we suddenly find our noses in our bosoms; detect ourselves, perhaps, even audibly asleep; and start, dreaming we are falling from the church-steeple, as, awoke by some friendly (or unfriendly?) hand, we suddenly rein in our nodding head, or else turn expecting to see one of the messengers sent by Sir Roger de Coverley to arouse the sleepers whose snoring disturbed the congregation.

Before coming to the foreground, where the painter rests the chief force of his argument, we must glance at one or two of the incidental allusions in his discourse. There is that bald pate, for instance, now seen just over the edge of the pew: we wonder how many times it has ducked under and jumped to the surface again, like a large pumpkin suddenly thrust under water. The bonnets do not do so, of course, because they are thinking too much of themselves. Then look what a row of blank, stolid, poor, helpless dummies there is up in yonder gallery. As for the clerk and his sternly folded arms—well we will not say what we have thought of him while in vain seeking to escape from his remorseless eye. And now, who can blame that poor child, although from his seeming to have been long slipping slowly through his clothes, the painter tells us cleverly that his sleep has been neither short nor light? No doubt the child did its very utmost to be "good." Who can blame even his poor old nurse or mother from letting him go to sleep in her arms; although she should not have subsided also into the arms of that heathen god of sleep? But, you see, if she had not been guilty of this wickedness, Mr. Roberts could not have given us such an amusing study of the old wrinkled sleeping face so full of latent goodness, and those thin lips leaving the straight breathing slit, just like the hole in the poor-box.

Sydney Smith says that long-winded preachers seem to believe that, if sin is to be taken from man's breast, it must be as Eve was from Adam—by casting him into a deep sleep. But these long sermons have assuredly a very serious as well as a comic side; and either Mr. Punch's or some other "extinguisher" should be let down upon some of those very long pulpit lights. Do not long sermons drive many from hearing the Word altogether? Have not the seeds of fatal disease been sown in the long hours passed in that icy-cold and draughty stone church? Have not some of the poor children, who, after being exhausted in a Sunday-school, are placed, without being permitted to sleep like this little fellow, up in those hard-seated galleries for other long hours, been brought to dread the name of a church? Such questions are surely deserving of consideration, and our motive in asking them cannot possibly be misunderstood.

"CARDINAL WOLSEY AT LEICESTER ABBEY."

PAINTED BY C. W. COPE, R.A.

THE subject of this noble historical picture is a theme which has taxed to the utmost the powers of Shakspeare himself. But even Shakspeare's dramatic description is hardly more pathetic than the simple and deeply-interesting narrative of Cavendish, the Cardinal's gentleman usher—the Cavendish who, afterwards rewarded by Henry VIII. for his fidelity to his master, laid the foundation of the ducal house of Devonshire. Guilt, in his "Life of Cardinal Wolsey," curtailed to an injudicious extent the last scenes in the Cardinal's life, but this omission has been rectified in Mr. Bogue's edition of the biography by large quotations from the early author. Cavendish says that Wolsey was seized with fever and dysentery while awaiting the King's further pleasure at Sheffield Park, the seat of the Earl of Shrewsbury, whither he had been brought from Cawood Castle, one of the residences of the archiepiscopate of York (to which the King had restored him after his first disgrace), and where the Earl of Northumberland had arrested him. In a greatly reduced condition, Wolsey was found at Sheffield Park by Sir William Kingston, Constable of the Tower, who, with twenty Yeomen of the Guards that had formerly been in his own service, came to convey him to London. Sir William on his knees assured him, in the King's name, of his Majesty's unbroken friendship, adding that it was not necessary for him to make more haste in the journey than suited his health and convenience. The Cardinal thought, however, that delay might be regarded as evidence of conscious guilt, and anxiously proceeded forward; but, although he travelled slowly, his illness was increased by the fatigue of riding a mule, and he rapidly grew weaker till, the third day after his departure, the cavalcade approached the monastery of Leicester, at the door of which the Abbot and friars, apprised of his coming, received him with all honour. When about to ascend the steps he said, "I am come to lay my bones among you." The presentiment was verified. He died three days later, and was buried in the church of Leicester.

There is nothing further needed to identify the various personages in our Picture—the fainting Cardinal supported by pages, the Abbot, the kneeling Cavendish, the mounted Sir William Kingston (Constable of the Tower and Captain of the Guard). And we are glad to place before our readers an Engraving of one of Mr. Cope's finest, though perhaps least known works. The picture has, however, all the admirable qualities of Mr. Cope's best-known efforts in oil and fresco, and was the result of a private commission from the late Prince Consort, given upon the artist's great successes in the Westminster Hall competitions of 1843-4-5.

Notwithstanding that the picture would have appealed eloquently enough without our effort to recall the historical data for the representation, no description of it would assuredly be complete which did not contain a reference to the passages in Shakespeare's "King Henry VIII." describing Wolsey's death and character, and which probably suggested the subject of this picture in the first instance. We allude to act iv., scene 2, of the drama—the relation to the dying Queen Katharine by her faithful under, Griffith, of the end of the great Cardinal, as the Queen thought, her greatest enemy, with the comments of both thereon. Griffith finished the account of the manner of his death, saying—

He eyes his honours to the world again,
His blessed part to heaven, and slept in peace.

Both. So may he rest; his faults lie gently on him!
Yet thus far, Griffith, give me leave to speak him,
And yet with charity.—He was a man
Of an unbounded stomach, ever ranking
Himself with Princes; one, that by suggestion
Tied all the kingdom: simony was fair play;
His own opinion was his law: i' the presence
He would say untruths; and be ever double
Both in his words and meaning: He was never,
But where he meant to ruin, pitiful:
His promises were as he then was, mighty;
But his performance, as he is now, nothing.
Of his own body he was ill, and gave
The clergy ill example.

Grif. Noble madam,
Men's evil manners live in brass; their virtues
We write in water. May it please your Highness
To hear me speak his good now?

Kath. Yes, good Griffith;
I were malicious else.

Grif. This Cardinal,
Though from an humble stock, undoubtedly
Was fashion'd to much honour from his cradle.
He was a scholar, and a ripe and good one;
Exceeding wise, fair-spoken, and persuading:
Lofty and sour to them that lov'd him not;
But, to those men that sought him, sweet as summer.
And though he were unsatisfied in getting
(Which was a sin), yet in bestowing, madam,
He was most princely: Ever witness for him
Those twice-ten churches that he raised in you,
Ipswich and Oxford! one of which fell with him,
Unwilling to outlive the good that did it;
The other, though unfinish'd, yet so famous,
So excellent in art, and still so rising,
That Christendom shall ever speak his virtue.
His overthrows and happiness origin from him,
For them, and not all them, he felt himself,
And found the blessedness of being little:
And, to add greater honours to his age
Than man could give him, he died, fearing God.

THE WINTER EXHIBITION.

THIS exhibition, unlike most others, is always undergoing changes, receiving additions, and suffering losses. Since we reviewed it on the opening day, many additional and many pictures have been removed and replaced. Among the new arrivals are several works of interest and value. The first we mention is a picture by Madame Frère, which is a favourable example of the naive truthfulness and poetical sentiment of this charming painter. Never has the old refined execution of this refined and delightfully illustrated than in Mr. Frère's works. Here are nothing more than two little children, who have taken shelter from the storm, or dressing, one of the articles of a batterie de cuisine, which we might call a saucepan, but in, we believe, more properly a stewpan. It is a copper pan, with a cylinder of water only placed on a stove; and they are now engaged in the not very nice, but perfectly natural, employment of endeavouring to get the last remnants of some sweet from the savoury sauce or sweet confection. Literally though vulgarly speaking, they are raising "pot-luck." The sturdy little girl plants the pan firmly on her lap, and drives the spoon vigorously round the inside junction of its sides and bottom, while her little chubby-cheeked brother looks on with the most eager expectation. There is nothing more in the representation, and the execution (though everything is perfectly painted) is not more than ordinarily careful; yet this is a picture of such rare truth to nature and purity of style that it might be studied with advantage by many of our over-clever painters of similar subjects. In the gallery of Frère's works, there are two child-like subjects, entitled "Summer" and "Winter," which have caught the manner and some of the spirit of the master. Mr. Hook contributes "Arming the Chevalier Bayard," one of those pictures, Venetian in colour and treatment, which belong to the first part of the painter's career, and are unlike to his native fields and seashore. This is a graceful, artistic work; and, although many will approve the painter's later style, we cannot help regretting, in looking at it, that nearly all our art should seem to tend to the more recording of mere incidents and life. Must we be always told that in our English hearts and heads there is little instinct of admiration for the noblest renderings on canvas of fancy, poetry, history and religion? Mr. F. Wyatt's touching and powerfully-painted picture of the widowed grief of Queen Henrietta Maria (exhibited at the Royal Academy last year) has been recently placed here. Mr. Calderon's Normandy matelot scene, "Le Secret des Amoureux," —with, apparently, improvements—is also re-exhibited. A head of a "Spanish Girl," by Mr. Burgess, is more of the natural and less of the conventional Iberian type than usual. Mr. T. F. Dicksee has sent three of his works, two reviewed in "Morning" and "Evening." Of these the title of "Cleopatra" is a mistake. It is neither classical nor Egyptian. The picture of a beauty of the last century complacently surveying herself in the glass is very pretty. These two paintings seem to prove that, although we must not expect to find Mr. Dicksee in the highways of art, his elegance and grace are always unfailing. Among other late additions are a view of Rye, by Mr. Tennant, and a picture of "Sunset" on a landscape by Mr. Hulme. By Mr. Long, a promising painter, who follows in the steps of Mr. Phillip, there is a picture bearing the alliterative title of "Seguidilla," which, we presume, represents a man kneeling before the door of the confessional box, which, as may be seen by the grille opposite, is occupied by the shadowy countenance of a nun, who is looking pensively at the penitent from the other face from the good padre. In the workings of the hard features we read the reluctance to confess some grievous sin. As the title of the confessional box over young girl waiting her turn, telling the beads of her rosary, and also looking penitent, but without the guilty workings of the man, it is not difficult to decide which of the two is to impute the "sins" and the "sinlets"—to coin a word for peccadilles. The executive part of the picture is unequal. The principal figure, Mr. Phillip's later manner, in which technical effects of colour and handling become too exclusively paramount. Mr. Roberts, besides the recently placed "Lord Clarendon's Last Interview with his Daughter," has a picture, "The Stolen Kiss," very carefully and well painted, saving only a certain mannerism, which too often diminishes from the entire satisfaction we should derive from his well-intentioned and otherwise meritorious works.

THE ARUNDEL SOCIETY.

The publications of the Arundel Society for the current year (nominally for 1862) have appeared rather later than usual. The copies of mediæval frescoes just issued to subscribers comprise five chromo-lithographs by Messrs. Storch and Severn, from certain portions of the series from the frescoes, so memorable in the history of art, of the Brancacci Chapel of the Carmelite church at Florence. The frescoes of the Brancacci Chapel were begun by Masolino di Panicale, continued by Masaccio, and completed by Filippino Lippi. They not only exhibited the highest advances made in art by Masaccio, one of the great landmarks in the history of early Italian painting; but they comprehensively and most instructively illustrate the state of art exactly midway between its first liberation from Byzantine bondage by Cimabue and Giotto, and its perfect enfranchisement and culmination with Leonardo da Vinci, Michael Angelo, and Raffaelle. The present instalment from this most important series includes—"The Raising of Petronilla by Masolino;" a head from the same, on the scale and in exact imitation of the original; "St. Peter Delivered from Prison;" and "St. Peter in Prison Visited by St. Paul," both by Filippino Lippi; and another large head from the last subject. It is well known that the figure of St. Peter in Filippino's fresco is that that saint visiting St. Paul was beyond almost exactly by Raphael for his cartoon "Paul Preaching at Athens." The outlines traced from the ancient works usually forming the basis of the annual issue are this year replaced by a copperplate engraving, by Herr Schäffer, of a drawing by M. Kupelwieser, after Fra Angelico's "Distribution of Alms by St. Stephen." This is in continuation of the series from the frescoes by the good Florentine Chapel of Nicholas V. in the Vatican, which are only second in interest and importance to the works by Fra Angelico in his beloved Convent of S. Marco, at Florence. We think the society has done well in replacing tracing by engraving. The latter method of reproduction is much more in the power of the ordinary draughtsman to execute, and will probably be found as rigidly faithful as the mindless mechanical process, with its inevitable imperfections of transcription. Another engraving from this series is announced as "in preparation," together with five more chromolithographs from the Brancacci Chapel. Among the "engagements and publications" shortly to appear are two important works by Benozzo Gozzoli, the "Death of Sta. Monica" and "St. Augustine Preaching;" and a noble work by Pisanello, "St. Eustache Journeying," and a noble work by Pisanello, "St. Eustache Journeying," and we are glad to learn that the labours of this society in endeavouring to preserve the best records of the many pure and beautiful productions of early Italian art are rapidly leading to the end of the obscurity every year more widely appreciated and supported. In the society's rooms, from the original drawings for the chromo-lithographs and important works we have named, and all the earlier publications, may be seen very admirable water-colour drawings from the following frescoes, executed for publication—the four famous frescoes by Lanzi at Sorcono: "The Presentation in the Temple," "The Nativity," "The Marriage of the Virgin," and "The Purification in the Temple;" three of the frescoes in S. Marco, by Fra Angelico, to which we have already alluded, "The Salutation," "The Virgin and Child, with Saints," and "The Crowning of the Virgin;" and, lastly, a curious fresco by Filippo Lippi, at Prato, perhaps the most remarkable work of the elder Lippi's which has been active in another direction. It has published a series of illuminated "large letters" from the famous choral service books of Siena and Florence, and a reproduction in plaster, by the Cheverton process, from a marble in the Elgin Collection, of one of the horse's heads by Phidias, in the eastern pediment of the Parthenon.

We announced last week that Mr. Frith, R.A., had received her Majesty's commands to paint a picture illustrative of the approaching marriage of the Prince of Wales. In the first instance, we understand, the Queen contemplated requiring from the artist a picture of the leading episode of the marriage merely, with the principal personages assisting. But the artist, with a commendable regard for the dignity of the occasion and the scene, respectfully submitted that a more comprehensive representation—treating the subject with the reverence due to a solemn rite in the "railway Station" and "Derby Day" pictures—might be more desirable and acceptable (which it doubtless will be to the whole nation), and her Majesty graciously adopted the graciously adopted the painter's views, at the same time approving of his terms viz., 3000 guineas. For a work of the above importance, proposed to be carried out on a large scale, he has now in hand a commission to paint three pictures of similar scale for 10,000 guineas. These are the facts of the case, and not those contradicted by the Art-Journal to the effect that the "terms" of Mr. Frith were declined, coupling with this mistake a perfectly unjustifiable assertion that the picture was to be in the Royal Academy, and not, as was the case, in the private collection of the Queen. The rumoured statement has been indignantly contradicted by Mr. Frith in the Times, and we may assure the public that there has been nothing "mercenary to British artists and British art" in the transaction; but quite the reverse.

A ROYAL Commission has been appointed to inquire into the present condition of the Royal Academy, in relation to the fine arts and into the circumstances and conditions under which it occupies a portion of the public buildings at Burlington House, and to report what is required to render it more useful in promoting art and in improving and developing public taste. The following are the Commissioners:—The Right Hon. Viscount Hardinge, Lord Stuart de Decies, Lord Sloane, Lord Wrottesley, Sir Richard Bethell, Sir Edmund Head; William Stirling, Esq.; Henry Danby Seymour, Esq.; and Henry Reeve, Esq. We trust that this is, at last, the "beginning of the end"—the removal of the Royal Academy from the rooms so urgently needed for the display of our growing national collections, and a thorough remodelling and reconstruction of that semi-public semi-private institution, the Royal Academy.

THE next meeting of the Council of the British Institution takes place to-day (the 7th), and it will be opened to the public on Monday. A detailed notice of the exhibition will appear in our next Number.

MUSIC.

THE MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON gave its first concert of this season at St. James's Hall on the evening of the 28th of January. Notwithstanding its youth the society has had what may really be called a long career before it. It has frequently been divided into two classes, fellows and associates, and including a great number of the most eminent members of the music profession, besides distinguished amateurs. In addition to these it has a constantly-increasing body of subscribers, so that the concerts have generally been crowded. On the occasion mentioned evening the spacious hall was crowded to the doors. The Musical Society of London was her majesty's Council of Music, and it was hoped that it would do a good deal the fashion among a party of musicians and musical critics to cenounce the Philharmonic Society, and to declare that many of the requirements of the age—as following an antiquated routine—and as deficient in the duties of producing new works and encouraging the talent of native composers. Such was mentioned evening the special hall was crowded to the doors. The Musical Society of London was her majesty's Council of Music, and it was hoped that it would do a good deal the fashion among a party of musicians and musical critics to den

LITERATURE.

THAT literary shell which must nowadays be set apart for the reception of novels has lately received three very notable additions to its contents. After running—as the modern manner is—an uncertain and fitful career in the pages of serials of more or less preferences. Mr. Wilkie Collins's No Name (Sampson Low and Co.) and Miss Braddon's Lady Audley's Secret and Aurora Floyd (Tinsley Brothers) have come before the public in a more independent and par libri fashion because completed shapes. It is understood that these several productions have been, or rather are, amongst the greatest, if not the greatest successes—in the publisher's sense of the term—that have occurred for many a long age, in the case of Miss Braddon's two works now collected following each other with unexampled rapidity. In truth, this lady author has sprung into an eminence amongst the literary class to which she belongs with a suddenness and brilliancy which are nearly unprecedented, at least since the days of Scott, or the case of the early numbers of "The Pickwick Papers," which one remembers as running a race of popularity with a single issue of "Murphy's Weather Almanack." As between Miss Braddon and Mr. Wilkie Collins there is one feature in common, as far as the present work of the latter (which is all we have to do with now) is concerned, and that is that the interest of their stories turns on the fortunes and characters of women; and in the instances of all three of the works before us the ladies, though endowed with all the most engaging requisites of personal beauty and mental capacities, in two of them at least almost rising to the height of genius, have been placed by the authors in circumstances and exposed to temptations so blameless in those times and with those in which heroines must from the necessities of their positions encounter as to repel the sympathies of readers; in the last the perpetual of punishment has been sufficiently extended, and the penitential epoch has arrived. If they are sinned against they are not denied the bundle of being allowed to sin, although, of course, from a narrative point of view. In short, very vigorous efforts have been made in these three to be put rid of the faultless monster of female and womanhood in its purely philosophical sense in white muslin, whose sorrows and disappointments are to excite sympathy only in proportion to their rarity, and whose sole endurance, who have suffered time out of mind through three volumes to be made happy it last by the very doubtful process of perfect love. The beautiful and interesting sinners of the future have been thrilling the novel-reading public of late are no puny representatives of the feminine class, but women, who one will come to know life at an early age, and who are endowed with that sort of courage and self-reliance which in men we are accustomed to call phyl, and who are by no possible light through these three volumes to be singlehanded. In the case of Miss Braddon's creations, so far from marriage being the end of their career, it is only the commencement of ease and altogether in the other as married women that their lives are presented to the reader; and in regard to both the heroines their hair does chare of their lives, by reason of the actual fall of the virtues; for they both happen to be in the condition for a great part of their lives to be endowed with two husbands at once. Mr. Collins, although he has done in a manner adhere to the conventional blessedness which comes in at the end of novel writing, has not omitted to bestow the same on his heroine in the middle of his tale. So far as this event is concerned it has something akin to that which we conceive to be the implied philosophy of Miss Braddon's novels, that the morality of a woman's life is not to be tragic at all, begins only when she becomes a wife; and perhaps one of the chief excellences of Mr. Collins's new work is that he exhibits in eluting out of the events of the every-day existence of our own time those elements of tragic interest which it is with us to deem affluent in the lives of former times. Sensation beings now, although the form of their development may be different, as it was, to use an Irishism, in the days of Shakspeare and respectively wrote. We have seen attempts to realise this theory on the stage, through the medium of a few pieces in which we have been was a failure, for the want of skill in adapting the machinery of the drama to the subject-matter. In Miss Braddon's pages the theory is, we believe, successfully worked out. Nothing can be more unexpected and unlike than the styles of the authoress and author whose recent works we have now under examination. That of Mr. Wilkie Collins is as measured and exact, both as regards his ordinary narrative, as the epistolary episodes which he is rather prone to introduce, as if scarcely any life had been omitted in the whole tale. His literary and legal advice, and carefully examined and settled by consultation afterwards. On the other hand, the manner of Miss Braddon writes with a fulness, a freedom, extending to a not unfrequent use of phraseology which, however, is too common to the talk of both sexes in our day, to render her amenable to any criticism on the score of want of ladylike reticence, which are accompanied by a copious command of language and a fertility in finding out always just the exact way in which it is likely to be made impressive to the reader; and thus you are carried along from the first story page to the pleasant motion, at once rapid and easy. In "Lady Audley's Secret" the styles is more terse and sententious, and, by consequence, less impulsive, but not, in the least, devoid of dignity. In both the chief fault we seem to us as it Miss Braddon's purpose was to illustrate the character of women who, from their misfortune to be deprived of a mother's care and a mother's influence. In the faults and follies of the one heroine, and in the positive crimes of the other, the absence of this influence is set out in a manner which is natural and not overdone, and the moment of penitential agony brings out the latent idea boldly when she cries that it is because she has been cradled. Although in some of the incidents there is a certain identity in Miss Braddon's tales, they are, in their mode of treatment and in the development of the characters and the writer essentially different. In "Lady Audley's Secret" the characters, the events, and the localities are all of a more interesting description, and, according to one point, on the elucidation of which there is brought to bear an analytical power, manifested in the characters of the two heroines, who is roused into tracking down the misdeeds of the Lady Audley of the story, which many a trained criminal lawyer would be glad to possess, and which we do not unadvisedly recommend to our readers. If now and then the acts of a woman, exhibited in this tale as hardly less than a beauty, and as absolutely perfect as to form as to face, and which, if taken as defects, may be attributed to the necessities of that serial form which is peculiar to the day. "Lady Audley's Secret" was very nearly wholly sustained, they are subjects unsuccessful for in the result; and, if the cause assigned for the impulses of a nature such as that of the heroine of the story be not quite original, it is dealt with by the author with sufficient skill to satisfy any but the intensely over-exacting critic.

"Aurora Floyd" the flight is bolder and more sustained, the standpoint of the plot is one which is decidedly risqué, and the character of the heroine is more dramatic. She lifts from the same ground of the picture with a certain aplomb that is wanting in the Lady Audley, for it is to the latter that we have referred the metaphysical contrast between the two ladies is as marked as their intellectual qualities and their general characteristics; and if they are both naughty in the same, and that very sense, it is not unreasonable as to reconcile the reader to the happy ending of the troubles of the one and the punishment of the other, although in the case of the manner self-accountant for whatever she may have had to undergo. Although Miss Braddon has devoted her best powers to the delineation of those lady personages among her characters and whose sufferings her narratives circle, she has spared little on the of the designs of the author, whose intuition in respect to the influences by which those characters are directed is not accounted for by any admirable of her qualities as a novel-writer. From the pen of a lady it is not probably expected that much humour should be distilled; but even in this regard Miss Braddon is not wanting. It is true, and happily true, that she shows none of the comic element of the modern school; but in certain characters and in certain situations there is exhibited a sense of the humorous which comes in just such nicely-adjusted quantities as to give so much relief to intensity as is required. In noticing—without entering on the whole of supersession, or, it may be, of anticipation, of analysing and describing plots and characters—the three novels which are just now in everybody's hands, it is, we think, to be observed that whereas Mr. Wilkie Collins in "No Name" has adequately, and indeed ably, sustained his reputation, evincing and developing every quality for which he has become most favourably and popularly known, he has not made any very appreciable advance upon his former works. Every one is, no doubt, satisfied, and feels that they have got as much as they expected from him; but it is just doubtful whether any one rises from the perusal of his latest work with the sense of his having exceeded himself. In the instance of Miss Braddon we venture to think it is otherwise. It may be a heresy to say so, but we think that there is rather more of art exhibited in the composition of "Lady Audley's Secret" than in that of "Aurora Floyd," but in all other respects—in comprehensiveness of design, breadth and vigour of treatment, in what for want of a better word we must call abandon in the indulgence of fancy and the triumphs of the imagination, have produced a work which will enable lady to our mind possesses in an eminent degree—there is no comparison between the two books. The last is the subject matter, the last and notable advance upon the former. In the instance of "Lady Audley's Secret" the author gradually won reputation; in that of "Aurora Floyd" she has not only established a position and has seized upon popularity.

There are certain advocates of temperance in tremendous totality of whom we have heard lately, and of whom it is believed we shall hear more in the ensuing Session of Parliament, who will probably be attracted by the publication of a work entitled "Cups and Their Customs" (Van Voorst). But if the object of the author, who preserves the anonymous, is to carry conviction in his pages, he has failed, for he has not made abstinence from alcoholic drinks, technically called "cups," the basis of a work in which he has given a history of the various intoxicating drinks at present holds sway at the festive boards of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and which, although not entirely unobjectionable, qualified; this, therefore, would be a step in the direction of temperance, if it does not progress far towards teetotalism. The author wishes to have facilitate the entire abstinence from alcoholic drinks, but he does but not intolerate" than that which Cowper indicates in that well-known phrase, "a little more than kin and less than kind." This is commended. He has dealt with his subject, in the first instance, from an antiquarian point of view, and he tells how the wincup passed in Anglo-Saxon days—how the Danes introduced their libations pottle-deep, and after what manner the Celts, Danes, and Germans, &c., contributed their quaffing cups to the various qualities and flavours of the wines and other liquors which were used by different nations, and brought into review. The natural and artificial history of the grape, of its cultivation, and how it is made to yield its juice, in fact, every thing connected with the vine, is specifically given. Then the author proceeds to the manufacture of the various cups, and the various materials of all its varieties which, as here shown, are numerous, while the skill of the workmen has been devoted to every style of ornament. With the gravity of a philosophic bon vivant, the author lays down that, in order to appreciate the delicacy of a well-compounded cup, "the taster must never drink to excess." Who could drink? Applicable as this may be to flavour, it might be extended to quantity as well. The chapter on "Cups and Customs" is a drinking we to think how much he is imbibing. In its way which our committing ourselves to its way—this little book in interesting, and may be useful.

At the time of the year there is generally an issue of new editions of useful manuals of reference, and of these we have had occasion to our notice. Of these we may mention the new and improved edition of Hazell's Annual Cyclopædia (Hazell, Watson, and Viney), edited by Mr. Vincent, which has just made its annual appearance from the publishing department of Mr. Moxon. In addition to this species of aid to be appreciated as we have remarked in the case of the book of the issue of a Manual of Dates, being a dictionary of reference to all the most important events in the history of the world, and to be the authentic record, which is due to the collating hand of Mr. George Townsend, and has been published by Messrs. Routledge. The work has been extensively revised and corrected, and, as far as we have been able to test it, accurate. The alphabetical arrangement of the work is highly applicable, and the information given on the English Sovereigns; but the lives of many great men of every age and country are illustrated in various articles. At the volume is of moderate size, the publication is to be issued in a form of a pocket specimen of clear typography. Towards the elucidation of the be expressed in the following terms:—"A concise but complete Lords' Parliamentary Companion, which has now reached its fourth year of publication, is issued in this volume, any description of the kind of information which may be found in its pages is needless task to those to whom it is especially addressed, while every one who has to do with questions relating to the peerage and baronetage may be safely referred to the table of contents for the shortest, quickest, and most reliable way of ascertaining the information he requires. The Handbook of the Court, the Peerage, and the House of Commons for 1863 has also reached us. Taking, from its very nature, a wider range than "Dod" has done, and having been in existence for a thirteen years, gives the amplest information relating to the Queen's household, the Royal Family, the Peerage, the Baronetage, and the public departments, foreign Ministers in England, the Queen's Ministers abroad, the Judges, the Courts of Law and Equity, and while its accounts of the Peerage and the Royal Families are remarkably full and precise, it is a most useful book in its way. The first part of the Imperial Gazetteer (Blackie and Son) has been published by Messrs. O. Byrne (well known in connection with a work on the surveying), and is to be completed in 24 parts, under the direction of The Aristocracy of London, Titled, Untitled, Professional, and Commercial. It professes to record the family particulars, military and civil services, professional and commercial pursuits, and personal and commercial pursuits, and general personal information in regard to the leading members of the aristocracy who dwell at the west end of London and in kindred localities. In most respects this work is a handbook to the gentry as well as the nobility; that is, it is to go beyond the range of peerages and baronages, and to include those who are included in the term gentry. The work is to be published at 7, Paternoster-row, Chelsea, Kensington, Notting-hill and Bayswater, Paddington and St. John's-wood, Belgravia, Tyburnia, Hyde-park and Regent's Squares, Hyde Park and Mayfair, St. James's and Belgravia, and Brompton and Chelsea. Some are to be set down who and what the principal inhabitants are. Messrs. Sotheran, Piccadilly, have published a Literary Map of England Attes of the World, which is an excellent specimen of geographical engraving. In addition to the map, which gives the new boundaries and numerous additions and improvements, accompanied by an alphabetical index of 65,000 names of places, with the latitude and longitude of each, and a table of the area and chief towns, a ready reference can be made to any point which it is desired to be sought in any of the maps. Mr. Stanford has published a Literary Map of London and its Suburbs, which includes the whole of the metropolitan boroughs and districts, the surrounding suburbs, extending in all directions, north, south, east, and west, to the distance of 10 miles from and from Leyton and Stratford to Shepherd's-bush and Wimbledon. The work has been expended in the preparation of this topography, which is in scale far beyond anything of the kind which has yet appeared.

A report is prevalent that the Alabama has captured one of the Californian gold-ships bound for New York with a million and a half of dollars in specie. The authority for the report is a letter brought by the West Indian mail-steamer.

A telegram from Toronto, Canada, dated the 16th ult., states that great excitement exists in Hamilton in consequence of the sudden discovery of oil in the vicinity of the city. Boring to a greater depth is being resorted to, and there are sanguine expectations of reaching another stratum of oil.

LONDON IMPROVEMENTS:
THE SITE OF ST. THOMAS'S HOSPITAL, AND THE CHARING-CROSS RAILWAY WORKS.

THE reader, if at all familiar with the locality immediately adjoining the London Bridge Railway termini, may, in looking upon the accompanying picture of its present aspect, exclaim with the black man in the play, "Chaos is come again!" The time to pull down, and the time to build up, and the time to pull down again, have here succeeded each other with rapid though not noiseless haste within the compass of a single generation the genius of change has been more busy upon this spot than upon any other portion of the metropolis.

Little more than thirty years have elapsed since the old High-street of Southwark, the Borough, the principal leading thoroughfare into London—with many a gabled and plaister house rising into picturesqueness—was swept away for the southern approach to the new bridge—the only one of importance approach accommodating a million of money, or double the cost of the bridge itself. The Southwark street, though doubled in width, is, even now, the old houses on the east side being only cleared away as far as St. Thomas's Hospital; but the most was made of the fine area gained by this removal. The hospital was rebuilt in massive proportions, with the north wing, for the site of which £40,850 was paid, and not completed an extravagant price, though at the rate of £24,913 per acre; and for the site of the two houses adjoining the City purchased of the hospital at the rate of £26,955 per acre.

In building the west side of the street, the east end of St. Mary Overie—in magnitude and architectural character the third church in the metropolis—was left open to view, though in the old street arrangement it had been hidden, save the upper portion of the tower, for centuries. Here the most marked of our present scenic the lofty pile of the Riberaia Wharf dwarfing the tower when viewed from the river or the south. The tower seen in the centre of the accompanying Engraving is 150ft. in height, and from its very position, and its celebrated view of London: upon the restoration of the tower and the rebuilding of the south side of the church has been commenced, at the cost of £45,000. This is the work of Mr. George Gwilt, F.S.A.—the Italian cornice, the enriched gable, with an elaborately foliated cross on its apex; pinnacled, at the angles, with niches at the base, with a new triple lancet window, and a catherine-wheel window of extraordinary richness and beauty. The vaulting was removed, and the iron roof covered with copper, the flying buttresses were cased with stone, the side windows began to be rebuilt, when Mr. Gwilt rightly adhered to the former work, "not only in the general design, but in the minutest details wherever prototypes could be found." The above is allowed, even by those who are disposed to be one of the most conscientious works in the country. We wish that half the same could be said of the new tower and the new nave of the church, restored and rebuilt by less painstaking architects. We must not, however, forget the Lady Chapel at the east end, which, after a stout battle with the Goths and Vandals of the 16th century, was restored by public subscription, under the superintendence of Mr. Gwilt and Mr. Cottingham.

The public had scarcely appreciated the "fine architectural group" we have just sketched, when, at the close of 1836, the opening of the Greenwich Railway terminus, close to the site of the metropolis—soon threw the locality into a transition state, which has continued to the present day. The railway companies of these bridges being for the Charing-cross extension into Hungerford; another for the Charing-cross Tower line into Farringdon-street; and the third between Southwark and London Bridge, with a line into Cannon-street, near the Mansion House. We are, undoubtedly, approaching the time when railways will not shame a mayor's carriage on its surfaces as it now has lines of main sewers. It is already grilled with telegraph wires, and gridded across second and third rate streets are not rare; but very shortly we shall have the principally Cyclopean progeny of iron bestriding our leading thoroughfares, as in the example shown in the Illustration.

The Charing-cross Railway Company, having determined on their plan of extension from the Hungerford suspension bridge, brought the authorities of St. Thomas's Hospital to sell them a small piece of garden-ground, one-sixteenth of an acre, for £20,000, which offer was refused. The public, it is said, at last interposed, and were vigorously opposed by the hospital; but at last the company got their way with telegraph wires. The hospital takes all very quietly now—all none; we will not let you have a part only." After long and tedious litigation and arbitration, the company were compelled to purchase the entire property. In 1862 the hospital has been removed to Lambeth. The north wing has been taken down, and the ground is being cleared; the south wing remains, and now stands on the left of the accompanying View. Meanwhile, the Charing-cross Railway line is in course of construction. Massive brick arches upon the verge of the hospital ground, until the arches reach Duke-street, upon which the line will be carried by a massive iron girder bridge, which, from the masses of its piles and the superstructure of its forms, already into insignificance every object around it, its Brobdignagian proportions crushing all the surrounding ground to a pigmy in the centre of the view, and making the summit of St. Paul's scarcely to be recognised in the distance. West of the roadway the brick arches are continued past the churchyard of St. Mary Overie, and now approach the Thames steam navigation. The visitor who is familiar with the history of the locality at this may be allowed a little sentiment as he views the vast nineteenth-century work passing close to the Stoney-street, or Stane-street, of Roman times.

Previous to the prior, the hospital ground, nearly four acres, is to be disposed of, while the hospital authorities have to decide upon the site for their new one. The £20,000 mentioned as first offered to have been obtained cheaply at £74,000 an acre; for it is stated by a correspondent of the Builder that several parcels of land have been subsequently let at rentals ranging in the neighbourhood. "The Alliance Bank has taken a piece of ground at £500 per annum rent, and pays £2,000 for the lease. A piece of £250,000 at Southwark property has just been taken, on a twenty-one years' lease, at an improved rent of £600 a year, the ground rent of this property is £258,000 per acre, in no better situation than the frontage of the hospital. The site of the old Townhall has lately been taken at £600 a year, the ground rent of which is £10,000 per acre." "The Alliance Bank has taken a piece of ground at £500 per annum rent, and pays £2,000 for the lease. The site of the old Townhall has lately been taken at £600 a year, the ground rent of which is £10,000 per acre." This will indicate a freehold value of more than £250,000 per acre." It is expected that the approaches to the bridge will become the site of buildings worthy of this costly location; and then the great iron horizontal centre—this engineering eyesore—of the present view may receive some embellishment to reconcile us to its intrusion. When this shall be accomplished we may look forward to the rebuilding of the east side of the High-street; but then will be swept away the most picturesque relics of old Southwark, including Stow's "many fair inns for receipt of travellers, the Spurr, Tabarde, George, Hart, King's Head, &c."

Advices from Alexandria state that the crop of cotton in Egypt promises to be most abundant this year. There will be not less than 180,000 bales for export, the quantity last year having been only 150,000.

CANADIAN LUMBER TRADE: A RAFT ON THE ST. LAWRENCE,—FROM A SKETCH BY G. H. ANDREWS.

THE LUMBER TRADE IN BRITISH NORTH AMERICA.

THE logs, having arrived at that part of the river where sufficient water and freedom from obstruction will allow of what is called "crib navigation," are no longer permitted each to follow its separate course, but a sort of small raft is formed by fastening together a number of logs, about twenty. This is done in the following manner:—Two round logs, called the floats, are placed parallel to each other about 24ft. apart, and between these the squared timber is placed. Across this series of logs are put transverse pieces of timber cut for the purpose, called "traverses," their outer ends being tightly pinned to the floats.

This method of fastening the loose timber is done with great skill and ingenuity, the object being to secure it together without injuring it by boring holes in it. Although held together entirely by pressure, not only are single cribs secure, but acres of cribs are bound together, and so perfectly as to be able to make long voyages down such rivers as the Ottawa and St. Lawrence. The crib is further secured by ballasting it with four heavy logs, called top logs, or loading logs, which sink the crib deeper in the water and create a useful pressure throughout the parts. Until the river is large enough to allow of the timber being rafted, each crib is managed as a separate concern, being attended by its own crew, who live on it and carry their provisions with them.

Until the introduction of those very important works—the timber slides—the logs on arriving at the chutes, and waterfalls so constantly occurring on the North American rivers, were allowed to tumble over any how, and were afterwards collected together again within a boom in quiet water below. The effect of this rude system was that a large percentage of the logs were so injured by abrasion as to be rendered worthless. Timber slides were therefore introduced, and immense benefits obtained by so doing.

A timber slide is an inclined plane or series of inclines, through which sufficient water is allowed to run to enable the cribs of timber to float through in safety, the water in the slides offering an easy and safe descent to the lower level in lieu of the perpendicular fall at the chute.

The slides are formed by excavating a passage through the rocks in the neighbourhood of the falls, and forming it into a regular work by flooring it with timber and lining the sides with planks. The pitches of the inclines vary according to the nature of the locality; sometimes there is a long, steep descent, as at the Hull slide at Ottawa; at others it is divided into several small inclines with level portions between. It was down one of this latter kind that his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales descended at Ottawa in September, 1860. At the bottom of the slide a floating timber apron is placed, secured to the foot of it; this allows the crib, when it arrives at the bottom to change its angle of direction easily—otherwise it would plunge into the water and the hands be washed off.

The cribs of timber, having passed the chutes in safety by means of the slides, are then collected together in lots of about fifty; these are bound together by twisted flexible rods or withs in such a manner that when com-plated and the whole formed into a raft it is sufficiently strong to bear the violent strains it becomes afterwards subject to when riding at its anchor in adverse weather or passing through broken water.

The raft being ready, preparations are made for the voyage, which in some cases is of several months' duration; in fact, until the introduction of the timber slides, the rafts were often unable to get down to Quebec in time to ship the timber during the same year in which it was got out of the forest where it grew. The cost of the raft, with its very numerous, ship aboard it in precisely the same way that a sailor does his ship. It is the lumberman's home for months: it is regularly built for the voyage, and has the necessary ground-tackle, as anchors, cables, &c., and also with rails, steering gear, and a windlass; houses are built upon it in which the men live, and a wind-sail to admit fresh air from an inclosure of short logs on a great circle—beneath is formed with an inclosure of short logs on a bed of clay, and a wooden frame above supports the continually-renewed cooking-fire.

The raft, having fairly got under way, is borne by the wind and the stream in accordance with the direction which the lie or pilot of the lumberman are by no means at an end, for it may happen that the river, though navigable for rafts for a hundred miles or more, has a still treed with impediments at certain points; on arriving at these the entire fabric has to be taken to pieces, and each crib run through the slides, if there be any; if not, every stick has to be separated, to get by the difficulty, and afterwards to be re-rafted. The Ottawa, from Lake Temiskeming to its junction with the St. Lawrence, is often so difficult as necessary to dissolve the raft into cribs about a dozen times in order to run the different rapids and slides.

But we will now suppose that the raft has passed the last of these obstructions, and, from whatever point it may have come, to have at last entered the great river. There is now plenty of room, and the raft speeds downwards, passing innumerable islands and flourishing towns on the banks. In some places the river widens out into a long lake, from the shores of which no shores are scarcely visible; yet the great river has its narrows and difficult passages the same as its tributaries. At some of these when assisted by a cross wind, on approach of the shores, it pushes through a contracted channel and down a steep hill with a velocity frightful to contemplate; huge waves lift their crested heads like Atlantic surges; white breakers foam and roar as they cast themselves hither and thither, over rocks, or upon the shores; the men stand to the oars, as the helm is now unclothed, but a lead moving in the forest foliage that inclines this extraordinary scene to the most sublime grandeur, before a bluff of water. These phenomena are peculiar to rapids, some of them are several miles in length; yet, in spite of the terrors that belong to them, several pass down in safety. The raft is timber too well bound to be rent in pieces; it creaks, groans, bends, and twists, as the waves wash over it; a stranger would imagine it doubtful to become a mass of chips during the terrible descent, but it emerges from the white broken waters unharmed. A traverse or a binding with started are, perhaps, all that is meant at the terrible rapids.

The last rapid passed, tide-water is soon reached, and then Cape Diamond may be looked for, towering above the surrounding scenery, and bearing on its broad shoulders the impregnable fortress of Quebec.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE BISHOP OF QUEBEC.

The Right Rev. George Jehoshaft Mountain, D.D., Archdeacon, Rector, and Bishop of Quebec, in Canada, and co-adjutor of Bishop Coleridge, Barbadoes, died at Quebec on the 6th ult. was the son of the late Right Rev. Dr. Jacob Mountain, who was the first Bishop of the English Church in Canada. Dr. George Jehoshaft Mountain was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1810, M.A. in 1814, and D.D. in 1824. He was consecrated first Bishop of Montreal in 1838, as coadjutor to Dr. Stewart, Bishop of Quebec, at whose death in 1837, he became administrator of the whole diocese of Quebec. In 1850 Montreal was made a separate diocese, and Dr. Mountain was then appointed to be Bishop of Quebec. His Lordship came to England in 1851 to meet the Bishop of Australia, to confer on the subject of synodical action in colonial churches. On his return he received the degree of D.C.L. at Oxford. The extent of his diocese obliged him to travel much; and, during the last few years, this exertion, with the severe Canadian winters, proved a most fatiguing journey to Labrador in the discharge of his duties. His Lordship was consecrated Bishop Coadjutor of Barbadoes and Leeward Islands, in 1861, which brought on congestion of the lungs and caused his death. The Bishop was the fourth son of Archdeacon of Tremata. His Bishop's family is of French origin, and came to this country at the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Jacob de Mountain, the Bishop's great-grandfather, and an ancestor of the Bishop, was great-grandson of the famous essayist, Michel de Montaigne.

REAR-ADMIRAL DIGBY MARSH.

Rear-Admiral Digby Marsh, R.N., who died recently at 7, Cintra-terrace, Cambridge, was the son of the late Mr. Thomas Marsh, Master Attendant of Queen's Country, by his wife, Rachel, daughter of Colonel Montgomery, and was cousin of the present Sir Henry Marsh, Bart., late Sir Henry Marsh, Bart., and of the Irish Judge Crampton. He was born in 1797, and entered the Royal Navy on the 1st of April, 1805. He was in the Minerve, and assisted at the capture of Copenhagen. He was afterwards actively employed in co-operation with the naval forces on the coast of Spain, where he was severely wounded in a trenching battery at the siege of St. Sebastian, in 1813. He was promoted to be a Lieutenant in 1815, and commanded the boats of the squadron employed at the destruction of a French quadrain and flotilla in the River Gironde. He next served in the Tortar, on the west African station, and received another severely wound. He became Commander on the 6th of January, 1823, a Captain on the 23rd of April 13, 1841, and a Rear-Admiral in 1857. He was married and had issue. His son Willoughby Digby Marsh is a Captain in the Royal Engineers.

THE REV. HENRY DRURY, M.A.

The Rev. Henry Drury, M.A., Archdeacon of Wilts, and Chaplain to the House of Commons, who died suddenly the other day at the ancient Suffolk and Devonshire Bruchill estate, Ampton, was a scion of the ancient Suffolk and Devonshire family of Drury (a family, by-the-way, whose was the eldest son of the Rev. London and Westminster Drury-lane), the son of the late Rev. Henry Drury, by Henry Joseph Thomas Drury, F.R.S. and F.S.A., of Bernham Wood, Herts, his wife, Grace, daughter of Joseph Price, Esq., of Bernham Wood, Herts, and was the grandson of Dr. Joseph Drury, Master of Harrow, who died in 1803. He became clerical tutor to his eldest son, in 1841, Brownlow Archdeacon of Wilts, in 1851, and was the editor of "Arundines Cantabrigienses," a work which is held in high esteem. Mr. Drury presented to the vicarage of Ingleborough, in Norfolk, by Bishop Coleridge, and presented to the vicarage of a Brenhill, which he held up to his death; and he, on the 16th of January, 1860, became rector of Ampton. In 1857 he was appointed Chaplain to the House of Commons by the present Speaker, the Right Hon. John Evelyn Denison.

The Marquis of Lansdowne died on the 31st ult., at his seat at Bowood, Wiltshire, in the eighty-third year of his age. A Memoir and Portrait of his Lordship will be given in next week's Number.

Sir William Arrindell, Chief Justice of Demerara, expired on the 27th of December, his death being occasioned by a fall down a flight of steps shortly before. He was about seventy-seven years old.

Messrs. Gless, Elliott, and Co., of London, had proposed to the Federal Government to patch up the coast and harbour defences of the entire Monroe to New Orleans, and to Galveston, if necessary. The joint committee, naval and military, to whom the proposal was promptly referred, reported against so cheap and economical a scheme. Secretary Stanton has written a letter to the military committee recommending the plan.

The Levant Herald of the 21st ult. says:—"Sir Henry Bulwer had a long private audience of the Sultan on Saturday. On Sunday his Majesty received the Embassy with a magnificent Kiahn which had the honour to sit in the Imperial stables. Mehemet Pacha, the new Grand Admiral, received from the French steamer on Saturday, and visited the same evening in a private audience by the Sultan, and remained for four hours with his Majesty. He is going to-day to Gallipoli to superintend the reorganisation of the British Navy, with the condition of which his Excellency is very far from satisfied, and to which he has resort by the careful inspection of the Royal dockyards and vessels of all classes in the home ports."

The Rev. Sir Henry Gordon-Lennox, Rector of Ashby, Bishop of Chichester, writing from Goldenville, gives a statement of the quarts crushed by the Pitton crusher and the results. The quantity, 45 tons, 16 cwt., yield of gold, 1186oz. 6dwts. 17gr. The letter adds:—"The probable amount of gold produced from other crushers, washings, &c., is about 960 oz., which added to the above, gives a total of 2145oz. 6dwt. 17gr. This will amount, at 3l. 9s. per ounce, to the sum of 40,000 dols., and is considerably more money than has been spent here in mining operations up to this date, considering the amount of money wasted in the early part of the season by persons too eager to make rather fortunes rushing into the business without knowledge or experience. Its smelter experience, however, has taught us some wholesome lessons, and capital can now be laid out to much better advantage; and no doubt, when a road is made with reference to the value of our quarts is more generally known, capital will be more readily invested."

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

UN MEMBRE DE LA SOCIETE LE GARD.—The solution of Problem No. 985 which you propose, beginning 1. R to Q 6th, has been sent in from many quarters. The mistake in that ending is given in three moves by that variation of play. The simplest mate would be given in two moves by 1. B to Q 5th.

BLACK.
1. R to Q 8q	1. Any move
2. Mate accordingly.

A. Z.—Your problem is correct for the problem, which seems feasible to us, though we cannot recollect at the moment where it first appeared. A second examination will, no doubt, suffice to prove whether it is of sufficient intellectual interest.

R. M. A.—1. See notice above to "Un Membre," No. 2. In your former description of the position proposed by yourself, Black's Pawn is at e4. The corrected version could be solved in three moves.

J. P.—The elaborate chess-writers follow of giving the first move to the player of the White men in the problems and positions they publish. This is a matter of mere preference for the White men to attack and the Black for defence. But to extend this practice to the publication as matter of fact, is to the last degree pedantic and ridiculous. We hope we may not be guilty of it.

Will the Chess Editor look again at your first solution, and you will see that the interposition of Black's Pawn at Q 4th will not do.

M. L.—The condescension of the new Code of Chess Laws is so general that the answer to it is contained in the words "Any move." Of course, the player may move any piece he pleases, and the opponent is bound to submit to it. The only exception is that of moving out of check, and even that is not absolutely compulsory. M. Lopezone, an able writer on the game in Paris, has published an article on "Castling" in which he maintains that the Rook may be moved over the intervening square of the Roi donne des Echecs, has the following remarks concerning it in his latest number:—"The new code, which is the result of the labours of the Committee of the Chess Club of Paris, is certainly defective in many points, but it is, on the whole, good, and it has been tried and it can be seriously defended. The abolition of castling en passant is one of its chief merits. The possibility of its rejection being remarkable. One of its clauses, that which permits the Pawn arriving at a Pawn after moving two squares, has previously been received influence, not only in France, but in Germany, in England, in Spain, and in Italy."

A SUBSTITUTE FOR NATURAL STONE.

The climate of England does not appear very propitious to the duration of stone buildings. It is unfortunate that this atmospheric antagonism to the integrity of stone is more lively in London than elsewhere. The metropolis of a country is generally distinguished by monuments raised to commemorate the advance of Religion, Art, and Learning. The history of the country is written as clearly in such structures as in books and pictures; and as the thought, and more than the thought, these historical couriers may last for ever, we construct them of "the everlasting flint;" but, for the building smoke, which destroys their beauty, disturbs also the coherence of particles, and the buildings upon which we are depending to convey to future ages the evidences of the genius of the nineteenth century are beginning to crumble to pieces.

Notwithstanding that the greatest care has been exercised in the selection of materials, the same end result is visible. The stone of which Buckingham Palace is built is yielding so freely to the said gases prevailing in our salubrious atmosphere that a coating of paint has been found necessary to preserve the carvings. The stone was selected by scientific men. A commission of geologists examined numerous quarries, and some thousands of pounds were expended in sinking shafts to get at the best stone to be used in the Houses of Parliament; but the river face began to drop to pieces before the building was announced as complete. It was urged by the commission that, because several old abbeys, built of the same material some 800 years ago had, in various parts of England, withstood the tooth of Time, and could show the mark of the mason's tool upon the stones as plainly as the first day they were erected, consequently this would be the best stone to use. Circumstances, however, altered cases. When this stone has been used in Manchester, Liverpool, and London, and exposed to the smoky atmosphere of coal-fire water impregnated with sulphate of ammonia and carbonic acid, decay has speedily set in. There is, however, some difference here, for it does not all behave alike even under these circumstances. Whitehall chalk-stone is a prominent example of a stone that is thoroughly incorruptible. The Museum of Economic Geology, under the Jermyn Street roof, also are built of stone from the same quarry as that of the Houses of Parliament; but note the difference! Nay, there is a great contrast presented in the behaviour of the same stone in different parts of the same building. An observer founded some blame to the contractors for the Houses of Parliament on the ground that the large blocks of carving throughout the river front have scarcely shown the least sign of decay while similar ornamental portions in the inland parts are passing away. He urged that, had the same care been exercised in the choice of the whole of the stone, as was evidently shown by the carver in the selection of those blocks which he desired to leave in their unperishable evidences of his skill, all would have been well. But the contractors in this case simply were able to state that the blocks were obtained from various parts of the quarries, were in no cases selected by the carver, but were got invariably more with regard to the less than quality. He further urged from this fact that, since the stone is exposed to the action of wind, rain, and sunshine, the less stable it is to decay.

Happily at this juncture, when the metropolis was fast sinking under the tyranny of brick, or brick and stucco, a ray of light plays on the subject and shows us some prospect of a more cheerful future. A gentleman who has been prying into the secrets of nature in the matter of stone manufacture announces that, with certain common materials, he can make a stone that will be perfectly unyielding to the attacks of London atmosphere. To those who had abandoned all idea of rivalling the architectural magnificence of Paris, this will be pleasant news.

It is generally known that Mr. Frederick Ransome, of Ipswich, has for some years past been endeavouring to give an impregnable surface to decaying stonework. The chemical researches which have enabled him to solve this difficulty have led to the discovery of an artificial stone, which, so far as any opinion can be formed of it on so short an acquaintance, bids fair to prove of the utmost value.

A moment's consideration of the manner in which stone is naturally formed will show that an attempt to imitate the process is not only feasible, but very probable to lead to a more successful conclusion. First analyses—then synthesis. A stone formed by the fortuitous combination of particles of sand and chalk is not so free from impurities as a stone artificially formed as a combination of particles designed to resist the same by the intelligence of man. In the case we are apt to have a variable product; but in the other, provided requisite care be used, our product is sure to be invariable.

The process for the manufacture of this stone is the subject of a recent patent. The material is composed of ordinary sand, chalk, or other substances, finely aggregated, and compressed into a solid, hard, and indestructible mass by means of a silicious cementing material, which, by a subsequent simple operation, is converted into an insoluble silicate of lime. This process can be described in few words, by relating what we saw at the recent meeting of the British Association at Newcastle. The stone had by him a number of cubes of sand saturated with a solution of silicate of soda. Bars of this substance, jin. thick and 3in. long, were separated by a knife from the main mass of the cube, and these bars of pure sand, by this fluid the particles lost all coherence, and the sand sank into a little mound at the bottom of the glass. Upon adding to the solution a solution of chloride of calcium, rigid combination was instantly effected, and a stone, so hard that it could not be indented by pressure between the fingers, was the immediate result. This change was well shown in the case of a bar half of which had been so treated, for, when immersed in the same water, that which had been submitted to the action of the single solution only fell away to the point of its junction with the hardened portion. It seems a fair assumption of the two solutions takes place to produce this sudden coherence of particles. The silica combines with the calcium and at once forms an insoluble silicate of lime, forming cement sufficiently strong to bind all the particles of sand, chalk, or other minerals of which the stone is composed. The other result of the reaction, the chloride of soda, is removed by subsequent washing.

In actual practice the mixing is effected in a pugmill. Issuing from that machine in a plastic state, the material is pressed either into blocks or moulds, and put into drying stoves, and thence in the solution of chloride of calcium. With regard to plain blocks, the expense of this process and the working of fronstone is pretty much on a par; but in the case of ornamental stone the mason's labour work the gain attaching to the use of the artificial stone must be strikingly apparent.

We have now before us a portion of the stone, fractured from a large block. The material of which it is made is one much to be wished judge such to be the case. It looks like a fine-grained stone of the colitic series. In appearance it presents all the characteristics of the best samples of Portland stone; and before we work the gain attaching to the use of the artificial stone must be strikingly apparent.

We have now before us a portion of the stone, fractured from a large block. The material of which it is made is one much to be wished judge such to be the case. It looks like a fine-grained stone of the colitic series. In appearance it presents all the characteristics of the best samples of Portland stone; and before we can form an opinion of how this similarity hold good, for, tested by Professor Anstead's method, it is found to be superior to the Portland in point of transverse strength, adhesive power, and resistance to crushing weight. The character, however, for which it is most to be valued is the possession of properties that cannot be destroyed by the virulent attacks of London atmosphere. The experiments which have been tried upon the action of sulphurous acid gas, passing with blocks of eight of the natural stones most used in London, in order to prove this fact, are reported by Professor Frankland, of Bartholomew's Hospital. Having submitted the samples to destructive agencies similar to those that abound in the atmosphere, but in a highly intensified form, he found that the degradation of the artificial stones is less in the case of the artificial than in the natural stones tried against it, except in one instance—namely, the Park Street white-grit stone of the first quality, procured near Leeds. The gentleman concludes his report with the following testimony:—"Considering that its binding material is insoluble in water—becomes harder and more crystalline by age, I am inclined to believe that Mr. Ransome has invented a material which, with the exception of the primary rocks, is better capable of giving permanency to external architectural decorations than any stone hitherto used." The only fear we entertain about it is lest the external induration should take place before the second saturation is completed to the centre of the mass. Should there be no strength in this objection we shall have to thank Mr. Ransome for having solved a national difficulty. It will be something to have released us from the tyranny of brick, but more to have given us a material wherein a form of beauty shall become "a joy for ever."

COLUMN FOR THE CURIOUS.

SIR WILLIAM PETTY AND THE LANSDOWNE FAMILY.

Sir William Petty is commonly described as "the founder of the house of Lansdowne," a statement which is not sufficiently exact for all readers.

The story of William Petty, from May, 1623, when he was born at Romsey, in Hampshire, to the time of his interment in the Norman Rumsey, in Hampshire, to the time of his interment in the Norman Romsey, in Hampshire, to the time of his interment in the Norman church of that town, in 1687, is one of those lessons of life which are scarcely to be often repeated. Anthony Wood, the antiquary, who was intimate with Petty, was the first to tell the tale. Collins and Birtgate, in their Peerages, have quoted the "ingenious antiquary" "carelessly and unfairly;" and The Penny Cyclopædia and "Sally Help" bring up the rear. Petty was the son of a clothier in humble circumstances, was sent to Romsey Grammar-school; and determined circumstances, was sent to Romsey Grammar-school; and determined next to study at the University of Caen, in Normandy. Thither he next to study at the University of Caen, in Normandy. Thither he repaired, provided himself by the way, with "a little stock of money" repaired, provided himself by the way, with "a little stock of money" and "a little wardrobe of clothes," and "a little stock of money" and "a little wardrobe of clothes," and "a little stock of money" and "a little wardrobe of clothes," and difficulties, no professional appreciation of its requirements. How inadequate its representation is may easily be adduced from the difficulties with which the reform of the most flagrant abuses is beset, resulting from the supine indifference which is but a natural result of the absence of professional knowledge and its indispensable authority. It is useless to expect that men fully engaged with other questions will devote time and painfully tax their attention, unassisted by professional knowledge, to combat the difficulties which encompass the question of medical legislation. There are few who will hesitate to acknowledge the unpregnable position of importance occupied in the social system by the medical profession; every-day experience of the teaching of life shows that. Is it, then, unreasonable to require that that profession should receive a corresponding Parliamentary importance? We have but to contrast the state of things in Continental countries with that in our own to lend additional light to the question, why, in our comprehensive system, are our medical and surgical colleges and schools unrepresented? While to this demand no satisfactory answer can be given there must remain a serious defect in the system towards whose perfection it is the duty of all to strive with the utmost of their will and ability.

The gentleman whose Portrait we now publish, and whose energetic and useful career during a period of eleven years, for which time he has represented the county of Leitrim, has led us to make the following remarks, is one of the very few members of the medical profession who are enabled to lend it the assistance of their knowledge and abilities in Parliament. John Brady, Esq., M.P. for Leitrim, has been returned three times. He is a justice of the peace for his county and a member of the Royal College of Physicians, also of the Royal College of Surgeons. He is a native of Cavan, in which county his family have resided for centuries, and he entered Parliament in 1852, when the expectations of his medical brethren were aroused in prospect of his future career. It was anticipated that "he would not confine his attention to purely Imperial questions, but would employ his energies and utilize his large professional experience and information in the task of removing those sanitary evils of which the public have so long complained;" and also that he would endeavour to procure a fair hearing for the various questions of medical interest and schemes of reform which, scarcely discussed and advocated outside the Palace of Westminster, had hitherto failed to command the attention they deserved.

Dr. Brady's Parliamentary career has not disappointed these expectations; he has steadily pursued the aim with which he undertook duties as onerous as they are honourable. He has not made himself conspicuous in the arena of party politics, though he has adhered unflinchingly to the principles which he professes with quiet good sense and moderation. He is essentially a useful member, one who will not shrink from honest hard work, nor be disheartened if the "results of time be slow." He is conspicuous for his firm advocacy of any cause in which he believes there is justice. He will be remembered as the first man who succeeded in inducing the Crown to give compensation in the case of an erroneous conviction. The case of Mr. Barber, which created so much feeling and discussion, was triumphantly brought to an issue by the unremitting exertions of Dr. Brady. He has been the steady and persevering advocate of all medical reforms which have been attempted within the House, while his time, his influence, and his scrupulous care have been lent to similar subjects when agitated among his professional brethren outside the Parliamentary pale. During the whole of the last Session he devoted his attention to the great sanitary question of the day—that of town sewage—and laboured indefatigably as chairman of the Committee.

It would be superfluous to dwell on the vastness and importance of this subject. Public opinion has defined it, and public attention is fixed upon it, not only in the point of view of its sanitary effects, but in that of its vast commercial importance. Dr. Brady conducted the business of the Committee in a masterly manner, his professional knowledge enabling him to elicit facts of great value and importance from the evidence laid before him, and his personal influence inspiring public confidence in the results. During the recess he has devoted himself to further investigation of this great subject, and the commencement of the Session of Parliament again sees him at a post which he is eminently qualified to fill with success and distinction.

JOHN BRADY, ESQ., M.P. FOR LEITRIM.

FOSSIL TREE.

THE fossil remains of which we give an Engraving were discovered in a quarry on the hillside upon property belonging to H. Whitmore, Esq., M.P., at Coalbrookdale. Similar remains having been abundantly found when the quarry was worked some years since the workmen were requested, upon its being reopened last year, to preserve any fossils they might find, and, in consequence, this fossil stump was carefully uncovered and preserved. The stump is a species of sigillaria, of which many large specimens have at different times been found in various parts of the Shropshire coalfield, in the sandstone overlying the measure of ironstone locally called the "pennystone." It was truncated, as is universally the case with large specimens, at the height of about three feet from the roots; and the soft internal organization had decayed and been replaced with sand; but the outside cylinder of bark retained its form, and preserved a carbonaceous covering. It evidently stood in situ where it had grown one of a group or forest of which others remain, was about 3ft. 6in. in diameter, and its roots ramified very regularly and extensively from it. Parts of the upper portion of the tree were found compressed perfectly flat in the stratification of the sandstone above. The depth from the present surface of the ground to the plane of these remains is about twenty feet, and about fifteen feet above them is a thin but unworked measure of coal—another representative probably of this primeval forest.

Notices of such remains will be found in Lyell's "Manual of Geology," p. 315; in Murchison's "Siluria," or in Prestwick's "Geology of Coalbrookdale," p. 444.

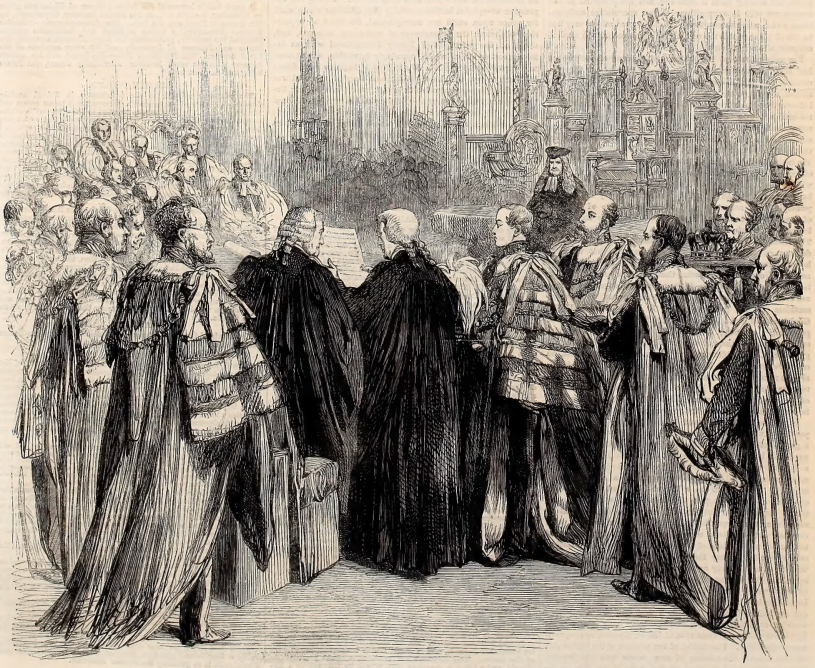
THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 1188.—VOL. XLII. SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1863. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

PROSPECTS OF THE SESSION.

THE fifth Session of the seventh Parliament of the reign of Queen Victoria—what is it to produce? This is a very universal, as it is a very natural, inquiry; and the materials for prediction in this instance are more than usually scanty. The ingenuity which is always exercised in causing a Speech from the Throne at the meeting of the Legislature for the year to be as little declaratory as possible seems to have reached its culminating point. For two or three Sessions past the stereotyped generalities which her Majesty has had to lay before the two other estates of the realm have been supplemented by a statement in the nature of a pledge for the initiation of at least one measure. There has been until now a gracious breaking of reticence so far as to inform the public that one bill, and that a law reform, had been actually prepared, and would be pressed upon the attention and the favour of Parliament. But this year even this slight concession to the legitimate curiosity of the liege subjects of this kingdom has not been vouchsafed. Not one measure has been formally and specifically announced; and the notices which the subordinate organ of the Government is accustomed to give on the first night of the Session of proximate legislation was more than ordinarily meagre. What we know is little enough, and what we can conjecture is all that is left to us. We have specific information that Parliament will be asked to perform what we doubt not will be a pleasing duty, namely—that of arranging for the establishment of the heir to the throne, and that under circumstances of peculiar interest. The Prince of Wales is about to enter on the duties of his young manhood, has taken his place as a member of the Legislature, will shortly give hostages to fortune by his marriage, and is to assume a species of vicegerency in regard to those functions of the Sovereign which are connected with the courtly observances so long forced into abeyance by the domestic sorrows of the Queen. From this point of view he possesses special claims on the generous consideration of Parliament; and, if we can judge from the high principles of order and economy which have regulated the Royal expenditure of the present reign, there is every probability that the propositions for his dotation will be moderate and just.



THE PRINCE OF WALES TAKING THE OATHS AS A PEER OF THE REALM AT THE TABLE OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.—SEE SUPPLEMENT, PAGE 167.

Doubtless the details of this subject have been long settled by the prudence and wisdom of that adviser of the Crown whose active counsels for the future have been unhappily lost to the Royal family, but whose foresight has most likely ensured the existence of a programme for the regulation of events such as the majority of the eldest son of England, and whose influence will unquestionably be felt in the discreet arrangement of the duties of the Sovereign and her children for years to come. Beyond this, an assurance that the Estimates of the year will be framed with a more than common regard to economy is all the prospects of the Session, so far as home matters are concerned, which are stated in the formal communication to Parliament which was delivered on the 5th of this month.

Since this oracular, in the sense of saying nothing, declaration, we have had from the Government the introduction of a meditated bill for the prevention of corrupt practices at elections, a sort of compound of the least troublesome parts of measures which have hung fire in previous Sessions; an announcement of a contemplated alteration in the mode of dealing with the Estimates of the disembodied militia; a bill for the establishment of registration of births and deaths in Ireland; another for consolidating the law relating to harbours; one for the consolidation of the rate in aid for Lancashire of last Session; and propositions by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, delayed by his necessary absence from his place in the House, to amend the Act relating to Post Office savings banks; and to reduce the existing customs duties on tobacco. The end is in registration. Those hapless, almost hapless, and nearly hopeless agents of legislation, called private members, have, in a few prescriptive instances, cast their storm beaten measures on the wild waters of the Wednesday sittings. Sir John Trelawny has, of course, introduced his measure for abolition of church rates; Mr. Hadfield has launched his measure, which is to apply to persons who are scrupulous in taking oaths from exactly the opposite direction of those purists in religious belief who are allowed to affirm instead of to swear. Mr. Hadfield has issued his annual manifesto, with a preamble and clauses, against the making of declarations essential to the holding of offices Imperial and municipal, although no official even dreams of troubling himself to comply with the imposing statute; and Mr. Whalley has had the courage to attempt to get the small end of the wedge into that solid obstruction to private legislation, the vast expenditure with which the rating and customs Parliament have surrounded the procuration of other than public Acts. Beyond this miniikin exposition of actual bill-making there is little else, and the prospects of the Session are still in supposition. A few speculative anticipations, which will not rise to the height of predictions, and may be out of place at this the end of the first week of the annual congress of our lawgivers.

For some years past the business of Sessions of Parliament has been eminently financial. In Mr. Gladstone we are, according to some, blessed, and in the esteem of others by no means blessed, with a Chancellor of the Exchequer who believes that his duty extends beyond a mere balancing of the national accounts, and is imperative on him to attempt annual adjustments and, if possible, reductions of taxation. As above stated, he has given indication of an intention to continue in that course. If all we hear be within a moderate distance of the truth, a combination of favorable revenue and reduction of expenditure will enable the Finance Minister to pursue that which he conceives to be his rational course. There is a boldness in his touch when he is about to apply his known principle, that reduction of duty is productive of increase of revenue, to an article like tobacco, the customs and excise imposts on which hover close upon a return of six millions. The critics on the resolution say that the proposed diminution does not go to the lowest class of consumption; but we have heard no fears expressed of any loss of revenue as the duty is accrue. Hopes are not wanting that enough will be left to afford a reduction in the duties on tea and sugar, and there are even faint expectations that the income tax will not go scathless of the pruning-knife. If this be realised, Mr. Gladstone will probably float over the Session on a high tide of popularity; and, of course, he will encounter the usual eminent denunciations of those who are of opinion that, as the guardian of the public purse and steward of its accounts, he calculates only for the hour, and leaves the future (which is always next year in the estimation of those financial croakers) to take care of itself. Hitherto, however, financial good fortune of the hour has accompanied his experiments, and his faith in his star cannot be expected to grow weaker.

It is true we have ceased to be garotted in such superstitious numbers as to have justified a daily publication of a gazette of the killed and wounded of the dark hours; but we do not believe that the nation will be satisfied with such a dealing with the question of convict custody and punishment as is implied in the mere report of a commission of inquiry. There must be a bill, and a good bill, on this question, and it must pass this Session. It would be by no means lenient to the duty or the care of a Government to undertake some specific and comprehensive dealing with the law of marriage as applicable on some principle of uniformity to the whole of the United Kingdom. The existing state of the law, to say the least of it, is unsatisfactory, and without expressing any opinion on the details of the question, some of which are annually nibbled at by unattached members of Parliament, it may be urged that the subject is ripe for legislation in a broad sense of the term. The recent efforts of our authorised law reformers to amend and put into proper working condition our law of bankruptcy have, partly from legislative and partly from administrative obstructiveness, comparatively failed. Unmindful of the wisdom of the text which decides against the putting of new wines into old bottles, it has seemed good to some of the sages of the law, in the sense of being old in years, who find cushions in the House of Lords so easy as to make them loth to quit them, so to manipulate the Bankruptcy Act of 1861 in its passage through Parliament that its conduct and administration were committed to a machinery confessedly effete and worn out, and which it was one of the main objects of the measure to supersede. The consequence, obvious enough from the first, has ensued that the law as it is attempted to be carried out is in a state of confusion worse confounded—is emphatically in a muddle. Amendment, sharp and decisive, ought to be—and we trust will be—applied to the system in the present Session. Having alluded to the question of church rates in a manner which was intended to indicate the unsatisfactory condition in which that question stands before the Legislature, we would venture to say that unless the Government which is to be supposed that Session in relation to it to act as a rule to a whole—that is, as a matter on which the Opposition may expend as much as possible of their Parliamentary energy at their chartered Wednesday sittings, when alone on their own showing they are strong and united, it is the duty of Ministers to bring their measure to bear on a settlement of the question, without influence, both religious and social. If the few measures we have thus touched upon are dealt with, and if there is reduction of expenditure and taxation, if efficiency is preserved in respect to the Navy, Army, and Volunteers, and progress, however small, is made in the path of reform, the Bill of which are within the scope and power of an ambitious and single-purposed Parliament in the next six months, it is quite possible that we may have to congratulate ourselves on the result of the Session of 1863. And this, we believe, may be done without interfering with those great political demonstrations which are, it seems, necessary to the very life of Oppositions and essential to the stimulating of Ministries. No doubt Parliament will be called upon to entertain and discuss matters connected with foreign affairs. There must be debates which affect international interests, and which bring on the outside international responsibilities of this country. The high congress of England must have something to say on events and eventualities in America, in Prussia, in Denmark, in Greece, in Poland; the cession of the Ionian Islands must be gravely and maturely considered; it is possible that the affairs of Italy, which are in a state of dynastic ferment, may come to be discussed. Paramount in the domestic circumstances of this realm, the Parliament of England must yet always make its voice heard in reference to those arrangements of other nations which exercise an influence on the world as a body politic. It is by the expression of such opinions that assertions that alliances which work for peace upon earth are strengthened, the hand of oppression weakened, the interchange of commerce enlarged, and, above all, the principles of liberty disseminated with an influence and an effect which, seemingly insensible, are as powerful as they are silent. We believe it to be no mere figure of speech to say, that never yet in the history of mankind was that influence more operative than now, when, in a manner, the Parliament of this country stands alone as the type of national freedom. But while this is a privilege it is also a responsibility; and we can but hope that in this, which many things tend to make as an eventful year in the fortunes of many if not of most of the other nations of the world, our Legislature will so discharge its duties as to vindicate its claim to the high position which theoretics lly belongs to it.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

Fancy dress balls have been the order of the day in Paris during the past week. A fete of this kind on a grand scale had been given also on Monday by the Emperor, at which a brilliant ball was given also on the following evening. Last Saturday evening a fete was given by the Minister of Foreign Affairs and Madame Drouyn de Lhuys, the Emperor and Empress being present. The ball given by the Countess de Persigny on Thursday last was also successful.

On Monday M. Pajeu presented to their Majesties the marble group by Vela which the Milanese ladies have sent as a gift to the Empress.

The Grand Duke Constantine arrived at Nice on Monday from the Crimea to assist on the Corps Legislatif when we went to press. The debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, which was powerfully assailed by Jules Favre, and which M. Billault strove to justify, the Minister was participating in person at the request of the Corps Legislatif, the Emperor's Government is "adventurous," and demanded that the Chamber should support it in the Mexican expedition. A message from the Emperor to the expedition was rejected by a large majority.

Galignani announces the sudden decease of General the Marquis de Grammont, a member of the Senate. He was present at the last sitting of that body. Six seats are now vacant in the Upper Chamber.

M. Delaunay has been appointed Director of the Imperial Military Academy of Saint-Cyr, and will be succeeded at Marseilles by M. Dumas, who has attained the rank of General of Division.

The Emperor has given the Duke of Malakoff, published in Saturday's Moniteur, in which he says he is as much Emperor of the Arabs of Algeria as of the French, announces the preparation of a scientific expedition to the Sahara under tribes and fractions of tribes indefeasible proprietors of the territory they occupy and which they have had in immemorial possession.

The Moniteur states that the insurrection at Saigon has been completely suppressed, and that the French Admiral hopes its prompt repression will have a favourable effect in producing a lasting peace.

There were various conflicting rumours at New York in reference to the Mexican war, and these affirmed that the French had several reverses, while others had it that Puebla had surrendered to the French. Some Mexican Generals Forey was to leave Orizaba on the 28th to join the troops advancing upon Puebla, the operations against which were expected to commence at the end of this month. The evacuation of Tampico had commenced.

SPAIN.

Much political derangement continues to exist at Madrid. Marshal O'Donnell is unwell, worried into indisposition, it is said, by prolonged Ministerial crises. On Saturday General Serrano, acting for Marshal O'Donnell, read a Royal decree suspending the siftings of the Cortes. This measures has produced a great sensation in Madrid, and a belief is prevalent that it will be followed by a dissolution. The Queen has reiterated the expression of her entire confidence in Marshal O'Donnell. Senor Pedro Aceviles has been appointed Minister of Justice, and Senor Ulloa Minister of Marine.

PRUSSIA.

The fiftieth anniversary of the appeal to the people in 1813 was celebrated in Berlin on Tuesday week with much ceremony. There were outdoor processions during the morning and indoor festivities during a later period of the day, to which many of the veterans of 1813 were among those who had spared participated. The festival, however, which the Court party hoped to turn into a demonstration in favour of the King passed off tamely, and was rather dull. The King appeared at one or two of the popular banquets and proposed patriotic toasts without reference to the crisis of the moment; but his language is described as producing little effect.

The King has replied to the address of his deputies. His reply is a personal one; he dispenses with the formality of speaking through his Ministers, in order that the Chamber may know his individual will. He assumes the responsibility of all that the Ministers have done; declares that, though the Budget was not voted, the administration must still be carried on; and gives them to remind that the Constitution requires the assent of all three Estates to the Budget. He insists on his determination to maintain the rights of the Crown, and adds that, after this explanatory statement, he expects that the House will meet his views.

In his reply to the address of the Upper House the King says that his heart is gratified at perceiving such a complete agreement between the loyal address of the Upper House and his own views. His Majesty continues:—"It will be the aim of this Government to firmly maintain the position it has taken up, at the same time remaining open to the approaches which may be made by the Chamber of Deputies, with the view of increasing the greatness of Prussia through her military power."

Troops have been despatched to Siemanovita on account of the number of insurgents having greatly increased at the Polish frontier town of Cralaca.

GREECE.

The Duke of Sare-Cobourg has ceased to be published in his official journal an account of the deputation respecting the proposal that he should become a candidate for the Greek crown. The Duke required that "Royal dignity should be given to King Otho and his family; that the Gotha Diet should consent to his accession to the Greek throne; that Greece should be "materially strengthened;" and that he should not cease to be a German Prince, but should govern Greece only until his nephew, the Prince of Coburg-Kohary, should be old enough to wear the crown. The negotiations were ultimately, we are informed, broken off by the Duke's declaration that "no favourable result" could be expected.

The refusal of the Duke to be put in nomination for the throne has caused a painful impression in Greece, and fears are entertained as to the maintenance of tranquillity. The National Assembly has passed a decree intrusting the Government to three members, each of whom is to preside in rotation.

SWEDEN.

The Minister of Finance has addressed a note to the Chairman of the Chambers, in which he announces that a project of modification to the civil list of his Majesty the King will be shortly brought before the Rigsdag. The namesday of his Majesty, the 28th of January, was celebrated with great enthusiasm. Ten thousand of the inhabitants of the capital went to the palace in procession with torches, and many houses were illuminated. The addresses presenting the King for the Reform Bill are pouring in from all parts of the kingdom.

DENMARK.

A great ball in honour of the future Princess of Wales was given on Thursday, the 29th ult., at the Swedish Embassy, Copenhagen, by Mr. Augustus Paget and his lady. The Dannark says:—"Besides Princess Alexandra, a crowd of the highest personages attended the festivity, particularly her Royal Highness's parents, the Prince and Princess of Denmark, and the other members of the Royal family. The Hereditary Prince and Princess of Augustenborg Princess Caroline were, however, unavoidably absent, the Prince being still far from well."

RUSSIAN POLAND.

The telegrams relating to the insurrection in Poland contain desultory accounts of engagements between the Russian troops and the insurgents. The latter are reported to have defeated the Poles in most instances; but in some the Russians were beaten with heavy loss. According to the latest accounts the insurgents have attacked several detach, and in one of the days, inflicted at a place in Lithuania or on the Lithuanian border, the Russian official account asserts that 1 hundred and fifty Poles fell, while the Russians had only twelve men killed. A considerable body of Poles has likewise, it is stated, been driven from Sandomir, where a "provisional government" had been organised, and the Russians are in close pursuit. Several villages or towns have been burned by the Emperor Alexander's soldiers, who are said to have destroyed the splendid country residence of the Zamoyski family.

General Rasavy, the Commander-in-Chief of the Russian troops in Poland, had been superseded (it is said in consequence of an attack of apoplexy), and General Samukin appointed in his stead.

It appears from the telegrams that the Prussian Poles are showing such strong tokens of excitement that the Prussian Government has deemed it expedient to assemble a corps d'armee in order to overawe the malcontents. At the same time, the Austrian Cabinet has prorogued the Galician Diet, apparently because the majority had given notice that they would move a resolution praying the Emperor of Austria to use his diplomatic influence on behalf of the Polish insurgents; and it is said that the Russian Foreign Office has made strong complaints respecting the supplies of arms and ammunition which the insurgents in Russian Poland contrive to obtain in Galicia.

WAR NEWS.

General Burnside has resigned the command of the army of the Potomac, and General Hooker has been appointed his successor. Generals Franklin and Sumner have been relieved of their commands. In these changes General Burnside has been treated with much kindness, General Hooker, in his first letter to the latter, and General Siegel the reserve. Snow is six feet deep at Falmouth, and the roads are impassable. The army is reported to be in excellent spirits, and that the army would, under more Burnside's letter of resignation says that the army, in General favourable circumstances, have accomplished great results. In General Hooker's short address on taking command there occurs the following passage:—

In the record of your achievements there is much to be proud of, and with the blessing of God we will continue something to the renown of our arms and the success of our cause. It is, therefore, absolutely necessary that all our energies be now directed to the unison co-operation of every officer and soldier in your respective commands. The country demands that we shall perform it, this army. In conjunction, therefore, with your brave commander, I ask your support. Let us never hesitate to give him battle, wherever we can find him.

General Burnside is to be examined before a Senatorial Committee concerning the battle of Fredericksburg, in his way by inferior officers. A list has been prepared of more than eighty army officers who are to be summarily dismissed for the same cause. So far as the proper language in reference to their superiors and the Commander-in-Chief in connection with the removal of General Burnside, and the court-martial and sentence of General Fitz-John Porter.

General Franklin has demanded a court-martial to inquire into the alleged charges against him of tardiness and inefficiency.

General Joseph Hooker is a native of Massachusetts. He served in Mexico on General Pillow's staff, and has resigned after the war. He was living in California when the war broke out. General Burnside has retired to his State, Rhode Island, where he has been flatteringly received by his fellow citizens.
